An Irishman fell from a ladder, and lay—apparently insensible—upon the ground. A crowd of sympathetic friends gathered about him, and a physician was called. He said at once that the man was dead, whereupon Pat opened his eyes and promptly denied the charge. "Whist, now, Pat," exclaimed one of the bystanders, "don't be talkin' nonsense! Sure, the doctor knows best!"

"The union," announced the labor leader, "is now in a financial position to stand a strike."

"Will the members receive full pay while they are out?" inquired a workman.

"Certainly not," was the reply; "but the leaders will."

I PRAYED, THY KINGDOM COME.

*I prayed Thy kingdom come ! For winter long Had held the frozen earth in fetters bound :
And wretchedness and misery, war and wrong,
Age after age, did in the world abound.
I prayed, Thy kingdom come ! And, lo ! the spring Came with its warmth and joy to glad the earth :
New hope the sight did to my spirit bring,
That man at length should share the quickening birth ;
For he who worketh thus great Nature's change
Works in the heart his miracles of power,
Than those we see more marvellous and strange !
Have faith in God and wait his promised hour ;
For he who doth the quickening springtime send Will sin destroy, bring suffering to an end.*

YEARLY MEETING EPISTLES.

THE time has fully come for a thorough consideration of the whole subject of "Epistles." They have held a very important place in the past, and as a token of fraternal relations they are still welcomed by many. But there is no escaping the fact that in most yearly meetings the period devoted to the reading of these documents is a time of deadness. The interest lags; they are seldom followed with keen appreciation; and there are very slight indications that they add to the weight and power of the session.

Dublin Yearly Meeting this year dealt with the matter frankly. The representatives to that meeting proposed a plan "to relieve the yearly meeting from the strain" of reading this mass of correspondence. They are careful to say that this in no way shows any "weakening of the kindly interest" which they feel toward Friends in America. This is perfectly sincere. Facts are facts. Yearly meeting business has enormously increased during recent years. The time cannot be lengthened. Epistles have become somewhat perfunctory. They seldom bear a fresh message. They are often long. They present very little actual information. They do not enable the gathered Friends to deal with their own problems with added insight. Those who have gone from yearly meeting to yearly meeting and watched the impression made during their reading—particularly where they are all read at a sitting—must have wondered whether the time was profitably spent.

Doubtless everybody would regret to see the bonds of fraternal union between the yearly meetings in any way weakened. That must not be. But is there not some way to overcome the present difficulties? We want nothing in our yearly meetings which does not minister to life and power and efficiency. If we can redeem our present system of correspondence and make it once more vital then let us do it. But if that cannot be done let us discover some way to transform the entire system. If we are to go on writing to each other it must be so done that it will add real value to the annual meetings. Our generation has little patience with anything dead or perfunctory.

We would make the following practical suggestions: (1) That each yearly meeting in America prepare yearly a brief account of its state and doings, something after the nature of the present reports of the quarterly meetings sent to the yearly meetings, only more condensed. These reports should be sent to the several yearly meeting clerks. They would make them up into a single document, which would give an outlook upon the life and work of all our yearly meetings. The reading of it would occupy little time, but it would bring the situation in the whole country before each gathering, and it would arouse a real and lively interest. This perspective is now lost where the epistles are read in a scattering way throughout the sessions.

(2) Similar reports from each body should be sent to the Meeting for Sufferings in London and in Dublin, or to such committee as these two yearly meetings should designate. These committees would in a similar way prepare a suitable summary for their respective yearly meetings. This would give our old-world Friends a graphic view of the work and the movements on our side the water without entailing upon them the reading of thirteen or fourteen somewhat lengthy epistles. This would, too, give each particular yearly meeting in America an opportunity to convey any special information it might wish to impart.

(3) Whenever a yearly meeting should feel a living concern to send some fresh message of a religious nature to one or to all the existing yearly meetings the way would be open for such an epistle. The meeting would conclude upon such a letter under deep feeling; it would be prepared with great care, and it would go out as a direct message, and, if it were done "in the life," it would accomplish that for which it was sent, and its reading would produce a deepened and quickened experience in those who heard it.

Some such plan as this would solve the problem. It would be a welcome change abroad, and it would improve our home correspondence, for it would put life and interest into it. We shall be glad to have it discussed and to see the coming yearly meetings consider this or some other system which will simplify matters and yet preserve the bonds of love and fellowship.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING opened on the 27th of last month and was felt by those attending it to be a favored time. These dear Friends in Ireland find it hard not to feel a little discouraged, because their situation is an extremely difficult one. Their losses have been great during the past generation, and they see no large inspiring future to work toward. But in spite of the smallness of their circle, these Friends have a clear mission and a place of real usefulness, and it is always well not to ask too anxiously about the future, if we are doing God's present work up to the full measure of our powers. God will take care of the future if men do all they can to take care of the present. We shall hope and trust that Quakerism has a long future in the green island.

Much of the session this year was devoted to a revision of the Book of Discipline, which, as we know in America, is always a large undertaking. The Revision Committee found the usual difficulties. Old phraseology is always precious to many, and others are afraid of new expressions. It is well-nigh impossible to get "Declarations of Christian Doctrine" which give satisfaction, because some want no change of ancient wording and others want statements that are too fresh and new to inspire confidence. Irish Friends have for the most part kept to statements issued before 1693. They found much difficulty in formulating their views on the freedom of the ministry. They finally settled upon this passage:

We consider the gift of the ministry to be of so pure and sacred a nature that it ought never to be undertaken for pecuniary remuneration; but when the servants of Christ leave their usual avocations at His call to preach the Gospel, their outward needs should be cheerfully supplied. As the gift is free, the exercise of it ought to be free also, in accordance with the precept of our Lord: "Freely ye have received, freely give."

Their attitude toward American epistles we have already stated. The epistles were read this year, but are to be summarized next year and read only in digest. The total membership of the yearly meeting is 2,511, which is a decrease of 7 during the past year. There were 17 births and 32 deaths. There were 23 persons received by "convincement." We publish under Correspondence an interesting letter from J. Bewley Beale.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE moral sentiment of the country has been deeply stirred by the discovery that poolrooms and gambling dens in New York and in other large cities have been able to carry on their illegal and wicked business by the assistance of the telegraph and telephone corporations. It was conclusively proved that the Western Union Company supplied concealed wires in order to furnish racing news to illicit resorts. When the first storm of disapproval arose, the Western Union officials attempted to dodge the moral issue and offered a very weak and unsatisfactory defence of its policy. This reply only increased the vigor of the public moral sentiment. The result is that this great corporation has bowed to public sentiment, and this emphatic order has been issued by the president of the Western Union Company: "It has been decided to discontinue forthwith the collection and distribution of horse race reports. You will please act accordingly. Robert C. Clowry, president and general manager." This order will cost the company millions of dollars. Such is the power of public sentiment.

THE London Daily News has been producing evidence to show that fully one-fourth of all the members of the British Parliament are either owners of wholesale or retail liquor establishments, or are interested in the liquor business as trustees. Under these circumstances it would be too much to expect any very far-reaching reform legislation. No matter how honest a man intends to be, it is extremely difficult for him to put his own interests entirely in the background. The members of Parliament receive no salary. They are hardly likely, therefore, to work for measures which would destroy their own income. When the liquor interests are involved, at least one-quarter of the members will be almost sure to be "lined up" against any radical reduction of the liquor business.

THE second number of the "Journal of the Friends' Historical Society" is at hand. It contains much matter of historical interest. Especially interesting is "A Contemporary Account of the Last Illness and Death of George Fox." There is a second article on "Recording Clerks" of London Yearly Meeting—devoted to Richard Richardson, who served the meeting from 1681 to 1689. The journal contains also a valuable article on "The Wilkinson-Story Controversy in Reading." Subscriptions to the "Journal," and applications for membership should be sent to the editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

If God made no response except to perfect faith, who could hope for help. He is the God of sprouting seeds and little vital beginnings.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

IMITATION IN THE RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT OF CHILDREN.*

BY IRVING KING.

That the mind changes in some way between infancy and maturity, is taken for granted by every one. Few people, however, can tell in just what the change consists, whether simply in the enlargement of powers present at birth, powers which grow more or less of themselves, or at least are present, needing only to be exercised by some sort of educative agency, or whether the mind is actually unformed, a mass of vague impulses and no definite types of experience, no definite mental powers, even in miniature. Assuming that the latter view is the true one, we shall note briefly how changes are wrought, how the little bundle of impulses acquires power to do many complex things, to think great thoughts, and to live in the power of an endless life.

John Fiske has made us familiar with the function of the prolonged infancy of the human being. It is a period of plasticity, a period not merely for learning, but also for transforming the vague impulses into definite reactions. We think no more, as did Locke, that the human mind is a substance merely to be impressed or shaped by eternal influences. We are sure that the little baby is very actively reaching out for sensations and experiences of all kinds, literally lying in wait for them. On the one hand, then, there is the plastic, unformed mind, with its tendency to reach out and take; on the other hand there is the complex world of things and people. The baby mind, as it reaches out into this world, is gradually organized with reference to it. It takes up the values it finds and learns to use them, learns to react in such a way as to produce desirable results. According to this view of the child mind, the influences brought to bear upon it, the atmosphere in which it lives, while not shaping the child as mere plastic clay, do furnish the context in which his plastic mind takes definite shape. The activities going on about him, the things he sees, the words he hears, serve to bring his impulses to a focus in certain definite directions. Impulses that mean nothing in particular, if once used in some definite way, acquire a significance in that direction. Their meaning is largely determined by that which has brought them to a focus. Sometimes the context in which an impulse develops merely facilitates the organization of the impulse, sometimes it determines entirely the sort of organization that takes place. In learning to walk or talk, for instance, the child clearly has vague impulses in these directions at certain periods in his life. These periods, when he is on the alert for walking and talking stimuli, have been called "budding moments." He becomes alive to things of this sort that older people are doing and in that way his own impulses are brought to a head.

* Irving King, the author of this article, has recently published, through the University of Chicago Press, a very illuminating book on the "Psychology of Child Development." Price, $1.00.

As the baby grows older and passes into childhood, his tendencies to action become more general and the particular form they finally take is determined more and more by the kind of world he lives in. The activities of the little city boy easily focalize around the comparatively simple and easily understood vocations of fireman and policeman. In other words, the things children see and hear about them furnish centers around which their unorganized minds assume definite attitudes.

The significance of this method of development in the matter of religious growth is apparent. The religious activities and ideas that surround children furnish just the same sort of a defining context as do any other activities or ideas. They are centers about which the child can organize himself.

It is important to remember that much that is significant in the religion of the adult mind is beyond the comprehension of the little child—for instance, various acts of worship, attitudes of reverence and respect for sacred things, prayer, attendance upon church services, attention to the words of those who minister, etc. But it is with reference to just such uncomprehended things that imitation is significant. If children see these things going on about them, they naturally tend to imitate them, to be sure, more or less vaguely. But in imitating them they are taking the first step toward comprehending them; they are beginning to organize themselves with reference to them.

It is also important to bear in mind what is being increasingly recognized to-day, that children do not imitate an act to any great extent until it in some way appeals to them. Hence, imitation of the parrot type is rarer than we generally suppose. They copy an act in order to realize its value more fully. If this is true, in so far as children do imitate the religious activities of their elders, they do certainly have an impulse to realize their meaning, and the imitating serves to bring them to a consciousness of the meaning. What Professor Baldwin says of imitation in general is entirely applicable to the growth of the religious life. "The child's personality grows; growth is always through action; he clothes upon himself the scenes of his life and acts them out; so he grows in what he is, what he understands, and what he is able to perform."*

Certain "broad-minded" parents have been known to say that they did not wish to prejudice their children in favor of any one form of religious belief, and hence proposed to refrain from subjecting them in childhood to any definite form of religion particularly their own, trusting that they would choose for themselves when older. In cases of this kind that which is to be expected usually happens. When the time comes for making an independent choice there is usually no desire to choose at all, simply because, in the first place, their minds were not organized with reference to religious values. The religious mind with all its richness cannot be put on at a moment's notice. It depends for its strength upon the conformation given in childhood to those deep traits that are the fundamental woof and warp of the personality. If the child is not in the midst of situations containing religious elements, when these conformations are being effected, his character cannot be expected to be shaped with reference to such elements.

If children were not susceptible to what other people are doing there would be little chance that society would hold together. There would be no way to pass the values inherited and accumulated by one generation on to the next, for this is the only avenue of transmission. That which is to be transmitted is at first more or less external to the child, but he comprehends it by clothing it upon himself. His indefinite experiences and vague impulses are focalized and given meaning by this instinct to imitate. Imitation is thus not mere copying; it is copying for the sake of values that are imperfectly felt. There can be no question, then, of its value in the religious development of childhood. It is nothing to the discredit of childhood religion that it is imitative. It is simply the first phase of a child's effort to realize the meaning of what he sees in adults. How necessary it is, then, that the copy be pure and undefiled, for whatever the copy is, it is the basis of the organization of character that is gradually taking place. Whatever it is, it is that with which the little child clothes himself, that with which he interprets the meaning of his impulses. Happy are they who put bread and not stones in the little out-stretched hands.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE LIPS AND THE LIFE.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

Every true Christian, whether in high or humble station, is bound to be a preacher of the gospel. Remember that there are manifold ways of preaching Christ's gospel without choosing a text or addressing a congregation. Wilberforce and Shaftesbury preached God's truth on the floor of the British Parliament; Francis Wayland, Mark Hopkins and James McCosh from the presidential chairs of a college. William Carvosso, the saintly Methodist class leader, brought hundreds of souls to Christ; and humble John Pounds, the shoemaker, who baited poor street boys into his shop with a biscuit or a potato, was the founder of "Ragged Schools!" Jacob A. Riis is the orator of the slums, and the sailor, Frank T. Bullen, rings out his message from the fore-castle. Halyburton, when laid aside by illness, made a sickbed his pulpit. "It is the best one I was ever in," he said; "I am laid here for the very end that I may commend my Lord and Saviour."

A Christ-loving heart is the true ordination, after all. "As ye go, preach!" "Let him that heareth say, Come!"—these are the heavenly commissions to every one who has felt the love of Jesus in his or her soul. Knowing the gospel fixes at once the obligation to make it known to others. If I have drunk from the well of salvation I am bound to call out, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!" God has a vast variety of pulpits for His servants to preach from. Yours, my friend, may be in a Sabbath School teacher's seat, or in the nursery, or a mother's arm-chair; or it may be a work-bench, or in a counting-room. You may preach by a Bible or a tract or a loaf of bread on a poor man's table, or by an earnest talk in a mission school, or a faithful pleading with an impenitent soul. Any way that will give you a hold on a sinner's heart and draw him to the Saviour. Any way, so that he "who heareth says, Come!"

But there are other methods of saying "Come" besides the voice or the printed page. Clean, consistent Christly living is a mighty magnet to draw souls to Jesus. A godly example is the most powerful attractor towards heaven. Even the most eloquent pastor will find that his people look at him during the week to find out what he means on the Sabbath. Preaching piety on one day of the week does not counteract the practicing of selfishness or cowardice or compromise with wrong on the other six days. If we say "Come," with the lips, it is well; if we say "Come," with the life, it is still better.

Bible religion made attractive to others is the most potent instrument for the conversion of souls. But few people are eloquent with the lips; yet every Christian may rise to the eloquence of a winsome example. If you cannot utter a truth from the desk or the platform, you can live out the truth; that is the best preaching, after all. No infidel can answer that. It draws silently, but surely. It says "Come" by showing the way. The "living epistle" never needs a translation or a commentary. It is in plain English, that a child can understand. An arrant skeptic once spent a day or two with Fenelon, and on leaving he said to him, "If I stay here much longer I shall become a Christian in spite of myself." Stanley also confessed that when he left London for Africa in search for Livingstone he was "as much prejudiced against religion as the worst infidel"; but a few weeks of companionship with the glorious old heroic missionary so impressed him that he said "I was converted by him, although he had not tried to do it."

More eloquent often than words is the silent beauty of conduct and Christly character. A poor, sick girl, for example, is wearing away her young life in a chamber of confinement. All day long and all the night for weary weeks and months the patient sufferer suffers on. But she bears the sorrows of her lot so meekly, she speaks of her discipline so sweetly, she exhibits such quiet trust in Him whose strong arm is underneath her, she lives out so much religion in that sick room that her worldly-minded father and her fashion-loving sisters are deeply touched by it. Her example is a "means of grace" to that whole family; they get no better preaching from any pulpit. Her deep, tranquil joys beside the well of salvation are a constant voice speaking to them, "Come, come ye to this fountain!"

I might multiply illustrations of this truth that godly acts often speak more impressively than words. A God-fearing youth occupies the same room with two or three giddy scoffers—his fellow clerks or fellow students. Night and morning he bends the knee in prayer before them. They make game of him at first; but he prays on. The daily reminder of that fearless act of devotion awakens presently in the minds of his companions the memory that they, too, had once been taught to pray, but now have learned to scoff. Example is an arrow of conviction; they, too, “remember their God and are troubled.”

In his day John Angell James, of Birmingham, was the most popular and influential of the evangelical preachers and writers in England. He said in one of his discourses:

“If I have a right to consider myself a Christian, and if I have attained to any usefulness in the Church of Christ, I owe it, in the way of instrumentality, to the sight of a companion who slept in the same room with me and who always bent his knees in prayer on retiring to rest. That scene aroused my slumbering conscience, and sent an arrow to my heart; for, though I had been religiously educated, I had neglected prayer and had cast off the fear of God. My conversion soon followed, and my preparation for the work of the ministry. Nearly half a century has rolled away since then; but that little chamber and that praying youth are still present to my mind, and will never be forgotten, even amidst the splendors of heaven and through the ages of eternity.”

Sabbath desecration is sadly on the increase, and the loose example of too many church members has something to do with it. On the other hand, the best defense of the fourth commandment is found in the higher lives and spiritual character of those who remember God's day to keep it holy. In no direction was Gladstone's influence more impressive, and I often recall his words to me: “Amid all the pressure of public cares and duties, I thank God for the Sabbath, with its rest for the body and the soul.”

The clear brain and the full purse of the total abstinence are the best temperance lecture. Actions speak louder than words. If you wish to move others, move yourself! Cæsar never said to his troops “Ite!” He took the lead and cried out “Venite!” Paul acknowledged the power of example when he said, “Be ye followers of me.” Even the lips of our adorable Redeemer do not so move us as the study of His sublime and sinless life and the power of His self-sacrificing death.

Godly living is what this poor ungodly world is dying for to-day. If the vital union of believers with their divine Head means anything, it means that Christ Jesus pours Himself into the world through the lips and the lives of His representatives. “Ye are My witnesses.” “It is not I that live,” exclaimed the hero-apostle, “but it is Christ that liveth in me.”

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE ASSOCIATED INDIAN COMMITTEE WORK.

BY E. M. WISTAR.

The Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs held its annual sessions in Philadelphia the 19th and 20th instant. Of the eleven yearly meetings which unite in this work all were represented except North Carolina and Western. Of these two the former has taken no active part with our committee for a number of years, though it continues to name delegates, and the latter was not represented because of the two delegates named by Western Yearly Meeting, one of them, Nathan E. Hubbard, who has a number of times been acceptably with us, died recently, and the other delegate, by reason of pressing personal matters, was unable to leave home at this time.

The following were present, viz.: From New England, William O. Newhall and Myra E. Frye; from New York, Mary S. Kimber, Mary T. Tatum, George D. Hilyard and Carolena M. Wood; from Baltimore, John Nicholson and James Carey, Jr.; from Ohio, William J. Harrison; from Wilmington, Abigail J. Hadley; from Indiana, Allen Jay; from Iowa, William Jasper Hadley; from Kansas Yearly Meeting, John M. Watson, and from Philadelphia, Walter Smedley, Jonathan M. Steere, Charles J. Rhoads, Hannah W. Cadbury, Hetty B. Garrett and the writer; also our superintendents, George N. and L. Ella Hartley, just returned from their trip to Jerusalem, were present.

The work of the committee, now in its thirty-fifth year, centers in the ten Indian Missions in Indian and Oklahoma Territories, viz.: Modoc, Wyandotte, Seneca, Ottawa, Hillside (formerly known as Skiatook), Iowa, Otoe, Kickapoo, Big Jim's Band and Shawnee, the last-named station being the residence of our superintendents. At all of these stations meetings for worship are regularly held and Bible classes are taught by our missionaries, who in most instances have assistance from native helpers. There are also about a half dozen sub-stations, at which meetings are held somewhat irregularly. The total number of all meetings held on First-days at all our meeting houses has been nearly one thousand, with an average attendance of fifty-one. At most of the missions there are also additional meetings held one other day in the week.

The Skiatook Boarding and Day School, for a number of years under the efficient care of our friend Eva Watson, has been continued, but since the beginning of the present school year has been under the care of Daniel W. and Piety E. Lawrence, formerly of Indiana Yearly Meeting. Their work, together with that of their helpers and of Anna M. Ray, a minister from Maine and member of New England Yearly Meeting, we find to be earnest and efficient, and continues as the center of religious and civilizing effort for a considerable district of country. The illness and death of a boarding pupil, the serious illness of Piety Lawrence during a part of the year, and the presence of measles in the school and neighborhood, have much interfered with school work, and the size of classes has been temporarily reduced.

Day schools have been conducted parts of the year under some mission oversight at Modoc, Seneca, Ot-tawa, Otoe and Big Jim's Band, and at Shawnee, Wy-andotte and Otoe (barring the serious interruption at the latter following a disastrous fire), our missions have their close relations with the three Indian Gov-ernment Boarding Schools, both pupils and teachers of which attend regular meetings which are under care of our missionaries and through which we feel a wide influence for good is constantly being exerted.

One of the remaining strong and important fea-tures of our work is the family visiting, encouraged by our associated committee and superintendents, and very faithfully attended to by the several mission workers. Nearly four thousand such visits have been made the past year.

One of our Friends who has been specially perse-vering in this particular part of the work, in a recent letter wrote: "So, with our trust in God, we want to continue laboring and praying, believing that He will yet gather in many of those precious souls, for we have the promise 'Ye shall reap if ye faint not.'"

The present writer has been twice to Oklahoma and Indian Territory during the past year, and had the privilege of visiting and associating with all our mis-sionaries in their homes and at their posts of duty.

The physical changes which to-day are so rapid and noticeable in that country seem at times to tincture the moral and spiritual development of its inhabitants and bring difficulties which are less prominent in more settled communities. On the other hand, the very rough and uncivilized conditions are very gradually being smoothed and solid results obtained.

With a view to relinquishing the care of some of our older stations on a diminishing support, we have made overtures to the Committee on Church Exten-sion Work of Kansas Yearly Meeting, where the membership of all Friends in the two Territories is located, but have not so far received their co-opera-tion; our committee, nevertheless, feels that it may be right to make further representations in this matter as way may open, both because it seems to us desirable that this older membership should stand free from our fostering, and also because it seems well that our en-ergies and resources should be carried forward into the fields of pioneer work, and that the gospel message may reach some who may not yet have a knowledge of it.

It may be proper to state that our superintendents who have industriously and efficiently served in their present position for about ten years, to the increasing satisfaction of the Associated Committee, have now intimated to us their desire to be relieved, and, while having a little hope that their retirement may be de-layed a brief period, we have to face the fact and en-deavor to be prepared to install proper Friends as their successors in due time.

In concluding, we wish to mention the cordial unity of our committee's proceedings, and we desire the support and strengthening sympathy of all our meetings that have delegated us to the work.

We would humbly acknowledge having had our Heavenly Father's loving care and guidance amongst us, both with those who serve afield and with the meeting just held.

LESSON X.

SIXTH MONTH 5, 1904.

CHRIST'S TRIAL BEFORE PILATE.

Mark 15: 1-15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man. Luke 23: 4.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 30.—Christ's trial before Pilate. Mark 15: 1-15.

Third-day, Fifth mo. 31.—Jesus and Pilate. Luke 23: 15-26.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 1.—A King. John 18: 28-40.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 2.—A just person. Matt. 27: 15-26.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 3.—The crown of thorns. John 19: 1-12.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 4.—Determined beforehand. Acts 4: 19, 20.

First-day, Sixth mo. 5.—Despised and rejected. Isa. 53: 1-9.

Time.—Sixth-day morning between 6.30 and 8.30.

Place.—The trial was probably in the Tower of Antonia, which was near the corner of the Temple area. This tower was the official residence of the Ro-man governor. But the trial may have been in Herod's palace, which was on Mt. Zion.

Parallel accounts.—Matt. 27: 2, 11-21; Luke 23: 1-25; John 18: 28 to 19: 16.

Between the incidents of the last lesson and those of the present occur the feet-washing, the discourses related by John, the agony in the Garden of Geth-semane, the arrest and the trial before the Jewish au-thorities. The sentence pronounced by the Jewish authorities was death (Matt. 26: 66; Mark 14: 64). The Romans did not allow the Jews to put any one to death, and so it was essential that Jesus should be brought before Pilate on a charge which he would entertain. Pilate, who had been governor several years, was well acquainted with the Jewish religious disputes, and the Jews were perfectly aware that he would not entertain any theological charges. The only charge which would stand much chance of being listened to was treason against the Roman Government. This was made in three counts. (1) Sedition or stirring up the peo-ple. (2) Forbidding to give tribute to the em-peror. (3) Claiming to be a king. Of the first there was no evidence whatsoever; of the second there was no evidence; in fact, He had commanded His disciples to pay tribute; for the third there was some verbal support, but it was of a spiritual kingdom of which Christ spoke.

1. "In the morning." The real and formal meet-ing had been held the night before (Mark 14: 64); this meeting was to decide on some plan of action be-fore Pilate. "Whole council." The Sanhedrim.

"Bound." Jesus had been bound after His arrest (John 18: 12), but had probably been loosed at the time of the trial.

2. "Pilate asked him," etc. The account is greatly condensed. The charges as outlined above were made to Pilate. "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Pilate asks the question himself. The pronoun is emphatic, and the question may be a disdainful one. "Thou sayest." This was a Hebrew mode of assent.

3. "Accused him of many things." Luke 23: 2. Pilate was evidently little moved by the main accusations of the Jews, and they laid more charges.

4. "Answereth thou nothing?" That is, after the first question. There was no need of answering; his life was a sufficient answer, and he knew that Pilate was aware there was nothing in the charges.

5. "Pilate marveled." No wonder, for the attitude of Jesus was so different from that of most prisoners.

6. "Now at the feast he used to release unto them one prisoner, whom they asked of him." Amer. R. V. This was not an unusual thing to do at the time of festivals.

7. "Barabbas." He was just such a man as the Jews would like to make Pilate believe Jesus was. Nothing more is known of him than is told in this passage. Matthew calls him "a notable prisoner."

8. "And the multitude went up and began to ask him." R. V. "Do as he had ever done." That is, release a prisoner.

9. "Pilate had somehow, probably through the chief priests, learned that the people had called Jesus by this title, and he expected the people would like his own use of the title.

10. He knew that the popularity of Jesus with the multitudes had made the chief priests envious of Jesus.

11. "Stirred up the multitude." R. V. This was the first time that the people had turned against Christ. It is not difficult to account for. The first and most important cause was their extreme disappointment that Jesus, after the triumphal entry into Jerusalem only a short time before, had refused to take the place of an outward monarch or leader; but, as it seemed in their sight, had failed completely. again, it was a case of a regular traditional priesthood against an irregular prophet and reformer, and in such a case it is always doubtful which will win. "Barabbas." Compare Matt. 27: 21; John 18: 40.

12. Pilate evidently is desirous to save Jesus, and he tries to make it so clear that the cry for the death of Jesus is not a popular demand that he may be justified in refusing the demand of the rulers. The question should have been asked of himself not of the multitude. On him lay the responsibility.

13. "Crucify him." Equivalent to a more modern cry, "To the death, to the death." There is no doubt that they were instigated to make this cry by the chief priests and rulers.

14. "Why, what evil hath he done?" Pilate again tries to turn the feelings of the mob. Compare the narrative in Matthew and the message from Pilate's wife dissuading him from having anything to do with Jesus (Matt. 27: 19). Pilate's effort only adds strength to the demand of the populace. It is quite clear that there were no real charges against Jesus, and that Pilate finally yielded to popular clamor. Pilate knew Jesus was innocent.

15. "Pilate wishing to content the people." This was the regular policy of the Roman Government—conciliation. So long as the dominion of the empire was acknowledged and taxes paid, expediency was the basis of government. Had the people turned against the chief priests, Pilate would have saved Jesus. His effort to shift the responsibility for the act is told in Matthew (27: 24, 25). Pilate is doubly to be condemned: he acted against what he knew to be right, and he did it for his personal benefit. He received no gain from his acts, for he was soon degraded from his office and banished to Gaul, where he committed suicide.

Christian Endeavor

TOPIC FOR SIXTH MONTH FIFTH.

HOW MY SILENCE WITNESSES AGAINST CHRIST.

Matt. 12: 30; Luke 17: 12-19.

Second-day, Fifth mo. 30.—Peter's silence. Mark 14: 66-72.

Third-day, Fifth mo. 31.—Paul's silent friends. 2 Tim. 4: 16-18.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 1.—A silent disciple. John 19: 38-42.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 2.—Lukewarmness. Rev. 3: 14-16.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 3.—The stones' witness. Luke 19: 39, 40.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 4.—The cost of silence. Luke 12: 8, 9.

The life of Christ was avowedly that of a representative. The things that He spoke were given Him by the Father; the works of His hands were the Father's works. If He had stood in His own individuality with the words "I" and "me" only on His lips, He could not have said "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." His life was one of witnessing to the character and purpose and power of God, and His acknowledgment of dependence was open and constant.

His is the pattern life; yet to-day men are trying to live Christian—Christ-like—lives without open confession. The Christ did not so live, and no one can ignore His example in this respect without in effect declaring that much of His teaching was superfluous—that many words that He spoke were spoken to no good purpose.

It is not a sufficient answer to say that our positions are not the same. Certainly we are not the propitiation of the sins of the world, but we are witnesses and messengers as to the completed work. Our Lord's words are, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you." He came to witness concerning God; we go to witness concerning Him. If we are silent, if we fail to proclaim our Sovereign, to name our Principal; we appear not in any representative capacity, but for ourselves. We are not witnesses, but deniers. Christ said to His disciples: "Ye are my witnesses," and unless we are witnesses, how can we claim to be disciples?

A Hindoo, visiting in England, troubled in conscience, asked his neighbor at a great dinner to tell him something about Christ, the founder of his religion. "Hush," said his new acquaintance, "we do not speak of such things at dinner parties." At another time he asked his partner in a dance the same question and received a similar reply. Was there not in such evasion a denial of their nominal Lord—a confession that they were none of His?

It is not only for Jesus' sake, though He is worthy of the glory and entitled to require from us the acknowledgment of His lordship; but the appeal is to our highest self-interest as well. Our denial of Him necessarily cuts us off from Him. Alienated and rebellious spirits could not abide the majesty of His presence, nor could they harmonize with nor enjoy the notes of praise that ascend to the Redeemer in glory. To join that chorus requires preparation here. Not to prepare is to dishonor Him and to destroy ourselves.

Correspondence.

Millbrook, N. Y., Fifth month 15th, 1904.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Dear Friend: Referring to the editorial of Fifth month 12th, "A Single Church for Rural Districts," conditions here seem to indicate that such an arrangement may have its disadvantages.

One hundred years ago this was a Quaker community, and a large brick meeting house was needed to accommodate the throngs that came on meeting days. Without much competition without, the spirit of disintegration seemed to work within. At the time of the separation the meeting house fell to the Hicksites, and the congregation went on dwindling, till now only about half a dozen meet once a week, and sometimes not at all, and their house is kept in repair by a cemetery association. Forty years ago the Orthodox meeting was also dwindling, and other denominations held their small and infrequent meetings in a public hall of small size. The Hicksite and Orthodox boarding schools (Nine Partners) gradually faded away.

Just how it began would be hard to tell, but since that time seven houses of worship have been built in this community of some ten or twelve hundred, by Catholics, Episcopalians, Reformed, Methodists and Friends. All the churches, except the Hicksite, are quite well attended and supported, and seem to be doing good work without any serious disagreements. The houses are also kept in good order. The old Friends' School has been replaced by one of the best public schools in the State.

The condition of other villages near by seems to point to a similar conclusion. Washington Hollow has a community of fairly well-to-do people and one Methodist Church. They do not take enough interest in it to keep it painted and in repair, and the meetings are small and influence little felt. Pleasant Valley, with but little more wealth, has two churches; they are kept in order and quite active. Mabbettsville has one church, mostly built and partly supported by outside parties; it is little used. Lithgow, a smaller village, has two, and seems to take much interest in both. The list might be extended to take in several other places.

I offer no theory in explanation. I simply state the facts, and leave others to draw conclusions.

LONG BEACH, Cal., Fifth month 9th, 1904.

I have been thinking that perhaps some of the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND would like to hear from the Pacific Coast work among Friends. The year soon to close has been one of unusual activity and blessing. Every department of church work has been well looked after. Our pastoral department has been greatly strengthened by quite a number of ministers coming to us from the East. We would mention Lindley A. Wells, our pastor at Long Beach; H. R. Keates, at Pasadena; Amos Cook, at El Modena; Levi Reese, to soon take charge at Alamitos, and Joseph Peelle, for Berkeley. In all we have fifteen pastors, all doing good work in the meetings where they are located. Good revivals have been held in all these places. Many have been saved and added to the Church. John Riley has been engaged in revival work most of the year under the direction of the Evangelistic and Church Extension Board. His work has been eminently satisfactory. He held meetings at San Diego, Berkeley, San José, South Berkeley, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Bell Station, New River and Alamitos. He is now conducting a tabernacle work, called the revival band, in the northern part of the State. Amos Kenworthy conducted very stirring meetings at Los Angeles, Whittier, Long Beach and Pasadena. Our brother seemed to be greatly favored in speaking to the condition of individuals, and many were greatly helped in their Christian experience, and quite a number were converted.

Allow me to mention some very interesting features of some of our meetings. Two weeks ago, at one of our meetings the president of the College was invited to preach, and was not able to begin his sermon until one hundred testimonies had been spoken by members of the congregation, which occupied about one hour. Then the sermon followed with life and power, the meeting continuing two hours. At another meeting the same day in another city, where one of our noted ministers was invited to preach, the meeting continued in prayer until near 12 o'clock, at which time the minister did not think it best to preach. The meeting continued one-half hour longer in testimony.

At another of our meetings, two weeks ago, at the usual prayer meeting twenty-nine prayers were offered at the opening; and one week ago thirty prayers were heard at the opening. I write these things to show that there is abundant life in our meetings, and full liberty of the Spirit in service is enjoyed.

Our home mission work is prospering in San Francisco, San José, San Diego, Long Beach and in the country out from Whittier. We have quite a number of good workers in the home field.

The foreign mission spirit and work is in good health, and abundant fruit is being borne. Four Friends have gone to Central America; five to an Indian tribe, four of them Indians who were trained in our training school. All the above missionaries have gone out from our school within the past year. Our work at Kotzebue has been wonderful. We have some 500 converts amongst the native Eskimos (500 Eskimo Quakers), whose lives are an example to any Church in our land. They are but children, to be sure, but faithful and true. Not long ago one came to the mission, walking 250 miles, to confess his faults and to be helped back into favor with Jesus.

Our Whittier College has had the most prosperous year of its history in every way. The first class to graduate will graduate at the close of this term. The spiritual interests of the students have been well cared for. Quite a revival spirit was enjoyed, led by H. R. Keates, this spring.

The Training School in Los Angeles has had a year of great prosperity. A new building has been erected, with ample and well-adapted accommodations for the school. The building contains fifty-five rooms and a large school or chapel room. This school is not under the control of the Yearly Meeting, but is managed entirely by Friends, and all its trustees are Friends. All the teaching is strictly in accord with the views of the Friends' Church. This summer will be a very interesting one at the school. Horace Holding, the leader of the South China Missions, will recruit a band of missionaries and bring them to the institution for training and testing before they go to China next fall.

In this very brief way I have stated something of the work in our hands. May I ask Friends who read this account to send up a prayer for our work and workers on this coast. Our hands are very full; our work taxes our Friends beyond any portion of our American field. Our Friends are liberal (many of them), and still we are in great need of money. We have four valued Friends now offering for the China field, and some for Alaska, and we need a pastor for San Diego and one for San Francisco. I am thankful to report that my health has been the best the past year that it has been for ten years, and, while I cannot work as in other years, I am very happy in doing something to help forward the cause of Him whose I am and whom I have served in the gospel for fifty years and more.

JOHN HENRY DOUGLAS, General Superintendent.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

Friends' Meeting House, Eustace St., Dublin.

My Dear Friend, Rufus M. Jones:

I am sending a proof copy of our late yearly meeting by this post as usual. I dare say last week's "Friend" will have come to hand before this reaches you, and as E. B. Reynolds, from Leominster, was present and reported the proceedings, it will give you a fair idea of what took place. However, it may be well to add a few particulars which may be of interest.

We had only two ministers from England with minutes, and we were glad to have them. Their ministry was helpful and encouraging—one, aged and deeply taught with a ripe Christian experience; the other, an active, energetic evangelist, who paid a lengthened visit to America a few years ago. There were some unusual features in our late yearly meeting. All the sittings were held jointly, but our women Friends did not take as much part in the discussions as could be wished. The presence of the King and Queen in Dublin at the same time may have helped somewhat to divide the interest.

The committee appointed two years ago to revise the doctrine and practice portions of our "Book of Christian Discipline" brought in their report (the third portion, "Discipline," was revised two years ago and published separately), and those present were furnished with proof-sheets of the whole for reference, and many Friends also had received copies some weeks before. A lively interest was manifested in the work, and more than three sittings were occupied in going through the whole. Some valuable but slight alterations were made, and one important paragraph was added, upholding the divine authority and inspiration of Holy Scripture. The importance of Bible study was much dwelt on during the discussions. Another feature was the holding of a series of meetings specially for the young people at eight o'clock (instead of in the middle of the day, as formerly, when numbers of those residing in Dublin could not attend). The conferences of Home and Foreign Missions, which were both very interesting occasions, were held at six-thirty o'clock instead of seven o'clock, so as to leave time for both meetings. These meetings for the young people were considered very successful, with more than usual freedom in them, as older Friends were excluded. In this connection it may be no harm to mention that a goodly number of our younger members were either converted or received spiritual blessing during the recent mission held in Dublin by Dr. Torrey and C. Alexander, so that the presence of some of them at these meetings contributed to their usefulness. Perhaps the chief burden resting on the ministers during the yearly meeting was in reference to the indwelling of the Holy Spirit—the great importance of a fully yielded will, and keeping in close touch with our Heavenly Master—if real progress in the spiritual life is to be maintained. Mention is made in the minute on the State of our Society of the evidence afforded of the growth of this life amongst us, yet those who are acquainted with the inner work of the church feel there is cause for concern on account of the apparent apathy of some, chiefly amongst the middle-aged, and the growing love of pleasure and excitement so prevalent among people generally. The very small addition to our membership was also a cause of regret. Still, remembering the great fact that we are on the winning side, that if we continue faithful to our Lord and Master, we shall through Him be victors in the great conflict ever going on between good and evil, is an abiding stimulus to us to go forward.

Very sincerely,

J. BEWLEY BEALE.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Milton Kenworthy has been elected principal of the Haviland Academy, Kansas.

John F. Hanson has located at Boise, Idaho. His family expect to go to him soon. He finds the climate helpful to him.

Morton C. Pearson writes from Indianapolis: "I sincerely wish that THE AMERICAN FRIEND might go into every Friends' family."

Elizabeth Thornburgh left a bequest of $1,000 "for the general purposes and good of" the Blue Ridge Mission of North Carolina.

Edgar Sanders and wife are spending a brief time at the parental Sanders home in Le Grand. They are under appointment for mission work in India whither they expect to go soon.

The sixth annual meeting of the Nebraska Church and Educational Association of Friends will be held at Central City, Neb., Sixth month 9th to 12th.

Martha E. Newlin, of Westfield, recently visited West Indianapolis Meeting in the interest of missionary work. Following this a W. F. M. S. of sixteen members was organized.

London Yearly Meeting opened on the 17th inst., and continues until the 26th. Meetings are announced on the program for the 22d at thirty-three meeting places in London and its suburbs.

John Henry Douglas writes, in addition to the interesting letter in our Correspondence Column, that Friends on the Pacific Coast are full of work, and that there is a strong, well-united ministry in their meetings.

Prof. Eli H. Perisho, who has for the past three years so ably discharged the duties of principal of Whittier Academy, Salem, Iowa, has been elected to the position of president of Nebraska Central College. He will move to Central City this month.

Friends at Buffalo, Kansas, are building a neat four-room house for the use of the pastor. This is an old but small meeting; hence this effort entails some sacrifice. Contributions would be thankfully received by J. F. Glardon, Buffalo, Kansas, treasurer.

Wm. P. Haworth and wife, of Noblesville, Ind., and Martilla Cox, of Bloomingdale Quarterly Meeting, were present at the sessions of Plainfield Quarterly Meeting, the 6th and 7th of Fifth month. Wm. P. Haworth was favored in preaching the gospel, and the presence of the Spirit was manifest throughout the meeting.

Blue River Quarterly Meeting was held at Paoli, Ind., Fourth month 30th. Zeno Doan, of Danville, Ind., was present and had acceptable service. On First-day morning the house was crowded, there being no services at the other churches. Zeno Doan preached an able sermon. In the evening the W. F. M. S. held an interesting session, with exercises by the children and an address by Zeno Doan.

The fourth anniversary of the opening of The Hague Court of Arbitration was commemorated in Boston and in Philadelphia. Wayne MacVeagh, of Philadelphia, gave the main address in Boston. Our friend, Benjamin F. Trueblood, took part. Rufus M. Jones was one of the speakers at the Philadelphia commemoration, which was held in the old Swede's Church, erected in the year 1700.

The Friends at South Wabash, Ind., had a "roll call" meeting the 1st instant, an announcement having been previously made. The pastor, Tennyson Lewis, spoke on "Accomplishments of Friends," reviewing the rise and some of the achievements of the Society. The roll of membership was called by the clerk. Quite a number who were absent sent responses to their names, which were read by the assistant clerk. The results of this meeting seem to be encouraging, since it has taught the people to value more highly their membership.

Chicago Quarterly Meeting was held at Watseka, Ill., the 7th and 8th instant. Thomas Brown, superintendent of evangelistic work in Western Yearly Meeting, and Charlotte Vickers, of Chicago, were in attendance. It was a time of great blessing. The Friends at Watseka, Ill., have divided their workers into companies, and have organized three Sabbath Schools in the country near by. These schools are all well attended, and much interest and enthusiasm is manifested. Willis Bond preaches at a point five miles from Watseka each Sabbath at 3 p.m. The Junior Christian Endeavor is raising a fund to repaint the meeting house. The Ladies' Aid Society raised over $300 last year to be applied on the expenses of the meeting.

Rhode Island Quarterly Meeting was held at East Greenwich on the 4th and 5th inst., and seemed to impress every one who attended as being a season of more than ordinary divine favor. The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight on the afternoon of the 4th, as well as a meeting in the evening of the same day, was addressed by Alfred T. Ware, the superintendent of evangelistic work in the yearly meeting, whose presence and words were an inspiration to all who long for more intelligent and effectual service. The same friend, together with Charles M. Woodman, in their impressive sermons on Fifth-day morning dwelt upon the profound practical significance of Christ's earthly sufferings and death. The business session was also marked with much interest. Reports on the state of society indicated activity along many lines of useful religious work, and altogether the outlook seemed encouraging.

Bear Creek Quarterly Meeting was held at Bear Creek, Iowa, the 13th to 15th inst. Arrangements were made to hold a conference at Earlham in the Sixth month, at which various subjects of doctrines, methods and plans of work will be discussed. A plan was adopted for securing a permanent church extension fund, and monthly meetings were instructed to appoint committees to solicit for the same. W. J. Hadley was present and delivered helpful gospel messages on Seventh- and First-days. Elwood Day, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Bible Schools, was also present, and spoke at the "Bible School Hour" on First-day morning.

Vermilion Quarterly Meeting was held at Vermilion Grove, Ill., the 14th instant. Clark Brown, a visiting minister, was present, and his ministry was very helpful. He gave a temperance lecture in the evening after the quarterly meeting. The most interesting feature of the business session was the raising of $1,000 in the face of the meeting to complete the $10,000 endowment fund for the academy. This fund is known as the John Henderson Endowment, he having pledged $1,000 on condition that $9,000 could be raised by the friends of the academy within a specified time. Great rejoicing was occasioned by the successful completion of the endowment.

Friends in Philadelphia are arranging to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the building of Arch Street Meeting House, where the yearly meeting is held. As already announced, the celebration will occur on the 4th of Sixth month. The program is arranged as follows: Afternoon, three o'clock.—"Early Friends' Meeting Houses and Their Relation to the Building at Arch and Fourth Streets," by George Vaux; "Some Philadelphia Friends of a Century Ago," by Susanna S. Kite. A collation will be served from 4.30 to 7.00 p.m. Evening, half-past seven o'clock.—"Conditions Existing in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1804," by Isaac Sharpless; poem, by Francis B. Gummere; "The Social Life of Yearly Meeting Week, Past and Present," by Frances Tatum Rhoads. See general invitation on page 354.

The third annual conference of Stella Quarterly Meeting on the departments of Christian Work met at Cherokee, Okla., the 5th inst., and continued in session four days. The first session was devoted to the interests of the evangelistic and pastoral work.

A paper was read on "The Apostles as Evangelists and Pastors." The secret of the success of the apostles as evangelists may be given in two sentences: "The love of God constraineth us" and "Knowing the terror of the law we persuade men." As pastors they not only taught publicly and from house to house, but largely also by correspondence.

In the discussion the thought was brought out that much of the success of the evangelist is due to the faithfulness of the pastor in preparing the hearts of the people for receiving and retaining the seed of the kingdom. A paper on "The Present-day Needs for Evangelistic and Pastoral Work," gave as the first need a unity of faith. The endowment of power is also essential, and the question of power lies not only on the side of God's giving, but also in our ability (natural or acquired) to use it.

On the line of Bible School work valuable papers were read, showing that there are three objects to be gained in the Bible School, viz.: Bible knowledge, instruction of believers, and conversion of sinners. To reach these ends there must be study, prayer, enthusiasm.

On Fifth-day evening Prof. Jay, of Friends' University, preached a masterly sermon on "The Message of Salvation as Based Upon the Book of Hebrews."

The subjects of peace and literature were brought before the conference by ably-prepared papers and addresses. The sentiment in favor of peace and arbitration is advancing in spite of present wars. It is this opposition to the war spirit that prevents it from deluging the world, as in the days of Napoleon and Alexander. The peace principle is the cornerstone of the Church. The soul that is at peace with God must be at peace with all the world. Where the spirit of forgiveness is, there can be no war. Young Friends ought to be taught the doctrine of the Church, and that true patriotism is to stand for peace, even though to do so may mean imprisonment or death.

Some excellent papers and helpful discussions were given on the subject of literature and purity in art. The pictures on our walls, as well as the books in our libraries, should be such as to create beautiful and pure thoughts. The child is influenced not only by what he reads, but by what he sees as well.

In the session on temperance it was shown that one of the great needs in Oklahoma is preachers, teachers and voters, who will stand squarely for the prohibition of the liquor traffic that the safety of more than 99,000 school children, and of men and women as well, may be secured. On Sixth-day evening Mary Sibbitt lectured to a large audience, taking as a basis for her remarks, "There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, oh Israel; thou canst not stand before thine enemy until ye take the accursed thing from among you."

At the session on education, an address was delivered on the "Need of Denominational Schools."

An excellent paper on "The Christian Endeavor as an Out-reaching Force" was presented, showing that in order to be an out-reaching force the endeavor must have the nature of Christ; should throw out the lifeline at home and abroad; must have for his daily companion the word of God, which is the source of all strength. In the evening Prof. Jay addressed the young people on the "Endeavor and the Friend's Ministry."

The last session was devoted to the subject of missions, a paper on "Friends' Work in Foreign Missions," and an address by Prof. Jay on "What More Can We Do for Missions That We Have Been Doing," were both very encouraging and helpful.

The conference closed with a real feeling of thankfulness to our Father that His presence and blessing had crowned all the sessions.

An investigation which is being conducted in relation to the protection of cattle against tuberculosis by vaccination, shows that vaccinated cattle exposed for a year to daily contact with tubercular animals remained free from disease, while unvaccinated cattle exposed in the same way, become extensively affected. In connection with these experiments, calves of tubercular cows are being vaccinated and are then left with their diseased mothers and are allowed to use their milk, with the view of discovering whether vaccination will be effective under such conditions.

WHAT THE KING EATS.

What's Fit for Him.

A Massachusetts lady, who has been through the mill with the trials of the usual housekeeper and mother, relates an interesting incident that occurred not long ago. She says:

"I can with all truthfulness say that Grape-Nuts is the most beneficial of all cereal foods in my family, young as well as old. It is food and medicine both to us. A few mornings ago at breakfast my little boy said:

"Mamma, does the King eat Grape-Nuts every morning?"

"I smiled and told him I did not know, but that I thought Grape-Nuts certainly made a delicious dish, fit for a King." (It's a fact that the King of England and the German Emperor both eat Grape-Nuts).

"I find that by the constant use of Grape-Nuts not only as a morning cereal, but also in puddings, salads, etc., made after the delicious recipes found in the little book in each package it is proving to be a great nerve food for me besides having completely cured a long standing case of indigestion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is no doubt Grape-Nuts is the most scientific food in the world.

Ten days' trial of this proper food in place of improper food will show in steady, stronger nerves, sharper brain and the power to "go" longer and further and accomplish more. There's a reason.

fective under such conditions. Unvaccinated calves raised in this way, it was reported, almost invariably contract disease.

According to a recent statement of Postmaster General Payne the receipts of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending Seventh month 1st will be approximately $144,100,000. In 1896 the receipts of the Post Office Department were $82,499,208. In 1899 two hundred rural routes were in operation. At the close of the present fiscal year there will be over 25,000 rural routes in operation, bringing a daily mail service to more than 12,500,000 people residing in rural districts. Over 500,000 people are now supplied with mail by the star route carriers in remote districts, where the number of people is not sufficient to justify the establishment of rural free delivery, this mail being deposited by the star route carriers in boxes stationed along their routes.

The five bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church who have just been retired by the vote of a large majority of the General Conference have all passed 70 years of age. Bishop Andrews is nearly 79. Bishop Vincent is 72, Bishop Walden 73, Bishop Foss 70 and Bishop Malla-lieu past 75. Thus 70 is made the deadline. The thought which controlled the situation was that the efficiency of the Church demanded the change. It is true of some of these men that their power of adequately performing the episcopal functions had passed, but not of all of them. That it was easier to set aside five bishops than two or three, by making all fall at the deadline of threescore years and ten, is manifest; and that this will be for the future efficiency of a great denomination is to be expected.

It is quite apparent that the United States is to head the list of nations as an exporter of domestic products in the fiscal year which ends with the coming month. Until a comparatively recent date the United Kingdom stood at the head of the list. During the past few years, however, the United States has on several occasions exceeded slightly the figures of the United Kingdom, and the latest statements of exports make it evident that in the fiscal year 1904 the United States will be considerably in the lead. The figures of domestic exports of the United Kingdom for the nine months ending with Third month, 1904, were $1,073,538,366, and of the United States, $1,149,330,670, the total domestic exportation of the United States for the nine months in question being thus $76,000,000 in excess of that of the United Kingdom.

Prof. Ladd, of Yale, has made public part of a letter recently received from a friend in Japan, which throws interesting light on the spirit of that people in its present national crisis. "The nation," writes this Samurai, "is much soberer than it was at the time of the Chinese war." The reason, he thinks, is that Japan is more mature and more thoughtful than in 1895. "The unmistakable sympathy shown by your great people and by the English is doing us great good, by lifting us to the higher and more humanitarian view of things. Just as the treaty revision and the abolition of extra-territoriality of jurisdiction have dispelled the temporary distemper of anti-foreignism you met on your first visit here (this was in 1892), so will the friendly and brotherly feeling so universally manifested by the Anglo-Saxon peoples cure us of our narrow Asiatic feelings more than anything else. Nothing will so help to call up the 'yellow peril' as the fear and cry of the 'yellow peril' itself." What more eloquent justification could be asked of the power of our Christian missions?

The American Bible Society and the public as well are to be congratulated upon the decision of the society's managers to amend the constitution of the society so as to permit it to print the Revised Version of the Bible, a course which has long been urged on the society. For a long while there was so little demand for the Revised New Testament that the Bible Society was quite justified in its refusal to print it. But of late, with the publication of the notes of the American revisers, together with the demand created for the less radical and more acceptable revision of the Old Testament, and the growing demand of scholars for popular editions of the Revised Bible, the Bible Society managers have been led to realize the changed situation and to act accordingly. Consequently the Bible Society will publish in one volume the New Testament revision published in 1881, and the Old Testament revision published in 1885, under the supervision of the committee of revision, together with the Bible as further revised and edited by the American committee of revision and printed under its supervision in 1901.

CLEVER DOCTOR

Cured a Twenty Years' Trouble Without any Medicine.

A wise Indiana physician cured twenty years' stomach disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for twenty years, tried allopathic medicines, patent medicines and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the State told me medicine would do me no good, only irritating my stomach and making it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking coffee!' Why, 'What will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor; 'I drink it, and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well, that was two years ago, and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again, and I know doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. There's a reason.

Streets have sent out invitations covering those who could be reached on the lists of members furnished by the different monthly meetings; but in view of the difficulty of reaching some who may have changed their residence or address, the committee desire the widest publicity given to this invitation for all the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to be present at Fourth and Arch Streets on the afternoon and evening of Sixth month 4th. It is hoped that those who may not have received a card of invitation will kindly accept this notice as carrying the same intention.

The purpose of this gathering is not to exalt or glorify ourselves or our ancestors, but to promote social fellowship and acquaintance throughout the yearly meeting; and underneath this purpose lies the hope that we may by such means be more fully united in the service and household of Christ.

During the past week Japan has suffered the loss of a battleship and cruiser, while her land forces under Kuroki have been checked and driven back with heavy loss. The latter disaster has led many to suppose the Russian forces are larger than the events of the past few weeks would indicate, and that the retreat of the Russian army under Kuropatkin has been a clever strategic move.

THE QUIET OF THE HEAVENLY VOICE.

“With that deep hush subduing all
Our words and works that drown
The tender whisper of Thy call,
As noiseless let Thy blessing fall
As fell Thy manna down.

“Drop Thy still dews of quietness
Till all our strivings cease ;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace.

“Breathe, through the heats of our desire,
Thy coolness and Thy balm ;
Let sense be dumb, let flesh retire ;
Speak through the earthquake, wind and fire,
O still small voice of calm !”

FRIENDS IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.*

WILLIAM H. S. WOOD has written a very interesting chapter of Quaker history in his little book on Friends in New York city during the past hundred years. The question is often asked whether Quakerism flourishes best in the city or in the country. We have here a brief account of Friends living their lives and doing their work in America's largest city. It is not a story which "comes out" like the modern novel. We hear at the end of decline and weakness, and we have "explanations" for the falling away—no peal of happy bells, though there are vague hints at prophecies, not made by the author, of the time when "empty benches shall be filled and prosperity return to the Church."

Quakerism was at its height in New York just before the unhappy separation, i. e., about 1825. There was in 1830 a total of 1826 Friends residing in New York city to a population of 90,000, constituting Friends 2 per cent. of the population. The leading Friends of this period were also leading citizens, whose influence was felt throughout the city. Walter Bowne, a wealthy Friend, was once mayor of the city. Robert Murray was one of the largest shipping merchants in America and president of the Chamber of Commerce. It was his son Lindley who endowed the Murray Fund and who wrote the famous grammar. John Murray, Jr., was one of the leading philanthropists of the period. He was governor of New York Hospital, inspector of prisons, State commissioner to superintend the building of the second prison of the State, one of the founders of the Historical Society and a commissioner of public schools.

Francis and Jeremiah Thompson established the first line of regular sailing ships between New York and Liverpool in 1817, and this Jeremiah was the largest importer of cloths in America at that period. Walter Underhill was elected to Congress from New York. Samuel Leggett was president of the first gas company organized in the city. Israel Corse has the credit of driving lotteries out of the State in the first quarter of last century, and he got a bill through the Legislature making the sale of gambling tickets a crime. These are only a few of the names of famous Friends who carried their principles into practical life in the business and affairs of the greatest city in America. The list of charitable societies and schools in the city which Friends organized and managed is a very long one, and the fact stands out plain and clear that this body of Christians in the city—never numbering 2,000—had an amazing influence, and a power altogether out of proportion to their membership. There are, of course, many reasons to be given to explain why Friends in the metropolis have not kept pace with the growth of the city—(counting both branches, Friends now make only sixty-five-one-thousandths of one per cent. of the total population of the city). The first difficulty was the separation, which divided Friends into two more or less hostile groups. Then comes in the ancient difficulty of keeping prosperity from destroying spirituality. It is verily "a hard thing" to be rich in this world's goods and to remain a "good Friend." Many New York Friends did not stand this strain. Then, again, the rigid rules of Discipline of the olden time cut off those who "married out," which explains the disappearance from our fold of some of the noblest names in the list. It was a method of slow suicide. Another difficulty, from which we to-day suffer, was the failure of Friends to bring up their children "in the Society." Of the Friends who were "pillars" of the meeting in New York sixty years ago, thirty-two of the children remained Friends and sixteen did not. Of those who were "pillars" eighty years ago, fifty-seven children remained Friends and twenty-two did not.

It is more to the purpose to ask whether the ancient prophecies that "the empty benches will be filled and prosperity return to the Church" will be fulfilled. There are no impossibilities in the way. New York city needs a great Friends' meeting. It needs to have Friends, as formerly, among its leading citizens, in business, in philanthropy, in education and in civic affairs. It needs the Quaker ideals in morals and in religion. Can the little remnant become a great people? It can be done. But it will cost some tremendous sacrifices; it will need remarkable consecration, and it will demand at least as much wisdom as is required to develop the great commercial enterprises which have been such a feature of modern New York city.

*"Friends in the City of New York in the Nineteenth Century," by William H. S. Wood.

THE MOST SERIOUS SCEPTICISM.

THE Hebrew prophet saw God everywhere in the actual life and work of men. The people about him believed in God for religious purposes. He was for them a being who was flattered by prayer and pleased with the smell of incense. He troubled Himself very little, they thought, with the affairs of men, so long as they "did their religion" on Sabbath days and at appointed times. There was a complete break between "religion" and daily life. On week-days a man could "devour widows' houses," and on the holy day the same man could piously pray through his "long prayer." The prophets called this pretense by its right name. It was empty, hollow sham. It was sheer irreligion. They proclaimed a God who is concerned in the affairs of actual life; who is at the heart of justice and mercy; who is present wherever righteousness and goodness appear; who not only rides on the wings of the wind, but who moves unseen wherever the moral forces of the world are arrayed. He is an actual power in the personal life, in the home life, in the community life, in the civic and national life. His eyes run to and fro through all the earth. He holds the plumb-line in His hand and tests everything by it. He winnows men as the farmer winnows his grain. He knows the inward man and cares not for the vain oblation and the hollow tramp of the Temple.

The prophets had a single standard for all life—whether in the Temple or in the market. The people had a double standard. They believed in God and served Him when they were using the religious standard. They disregarded Him and disbelieved in Him the rest of the time. The result was that they turned out to be thorough sceptics. They did not believe in any real God who lived in the lives of men and who was concerned in the affairs of the world. Their God was a poor, weak Sovereign who held His court only on holy days, and who either slept or was on a journey the rest of the time. He could be ignored except on occasions when "worship" was in order.

This is the prevailing scepticism of our time. Honest intellectual doubt and questioning are easily cured. All the doubter needs is to see a little deeper, to go below the surface and find the truth he is earnestly seeking. That other scepticism is dreadfully serious. It eats the life out of a man before he knows it. It saps his inward strength and leaves him a hollow shell while he half believes he has a religion. The disease of this scepticism is eating at the heart of any man who doubts whether it is worth while to keep his soul pure and stainless. It is sapping any man who attempts to practice the double standard. It is working havoc in all men who conclude that religion cannot be put into daily life. To make God a toy for the altar, a being who cares for nothing but prayers and incense is to give Him up altogether. It is to settle down into a real scepticism unspeakably more dangerous than that of the man who honestly questions, because he is determined to find the true God. This double standard scepticism is very common and very ominous. It is not cured in a day nor by easy methods. It calls for the patient, faithful work of a line of true prophets who can again proclaim the living God, and, better still, it calls for a generation of men and women who by their quiet, solid, transparent lives shall compel men to see the fruit of faith in our God.

THE METHODISTS ON TEMPERANCE.

THE Methodist Conference in San Francisco adopted the following declaration of principles and of attitude on the liquor traffic. Article 5 gives authority to the Permanent Committee on Temperance to arrange for the proposed inter-church Temperance Conference in Washington in 1906.

1. Total abstinence from intoxicating beverages and from narcotics is the duty of every individual, and especially of every Christian.

2. We reaffirm our previous condemnation of the license policy, holding it to be wrong in principle and ineffectual as a remedy. We declare that the only proper attitude of the church is that of uncompromising hostility to the liquor traffic in all its forms.

We demand its complete legal prohibition, and pledge our best efforts to secure this result.

3. It is not the province of the church to control the suffrages of her members, but it is her province to teach great moral principles, and to this end we utter our profound conviction that no Christian should sustain a political party committed to the license policy. A political party that dares not defy the saloon, does not deserve the support of the church. A party in which manly Christian opposition to a corrupt and dangerous traffic is a bar to promotion, cannot be consistently supported by a Christian voter. But the foregoing must not be considered as in the interest of any political party.

4. We condemn the practice of the general government in collecting revenue from the violators of law in prohibition territory, and we record our judgment that the collection of revenue from the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, adopted originally as a war measure, ought to be promptly discontinued.

5. We commend all organizations that are seeking to mitigate the evils of intemperance, promote the cause of total abstinence or secure the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating beverages, but we are persuaded that our own church should use her own machinery with increasing earnestness to secure these desirable ends. However, we authorize the Permanent Committee on Temperance to take part in any co-operative movements whose methods approve themselves to the judgment of the committee.

6. We believe that all our people should not only abstain from the use of tobacco in all its forms, but from traffic therein as an article of merchandise.

The man who finds not God in his own heart will find Him nowhere; and he who finds Him there will find him everywhere.—David Swing.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

"WHAT SAYEST THOU OF THYSELF?"

BY M. CATHERINE ALBRIGHT.

It was a strange question, this, that the Pharisees sent to ask of John the Baptist. In the general confusion of opinions as to what to think of the new teacher, it seemed as if they might, without prejudice to their own verdict at least, hear what he had himself to say. There would be at any rate no need for them to acquiesce in the claim, whatever it might be.

"Art thou the Christ?" then, they enquired. But he said, "I am not." "Art thou Elias?" "I am not." "Art thou that prophet?" And he answered, "No." "What art thou then? What sayest thou of thyself?" And he said, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, 'Make straight the way of the Lord.'" "I am not, I do not claim to be any of the great ones you are asking about, but I can tell you simply what I am. I have a voice, a witness; my work is to call attention to another, to summon men to prepare for the coming Prophet whom I discern." The messengers were not wholly satisfied. "If you are not the Christ, or that prophet, or Elias, by what right do you baptize and take upon yourself such responsibility?" But again John answered them: "I am not going beyond my calling; my baptism does not claim to be more than what it is, a symbolic washing with water, to indicate repentance. But it will serve as a preparation for one who is coming after me. He will baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." "I do not claim that my work is complete or has any finality by itself. I am only laying a foundation, the true builder is coming after."

John, the rough dweller in deserts, the teller of home truths to a scornful generation, is very straightforward in his confession of humility. He is able to tell what he stands for, how little and also how much. He is able because he has often before answered the question, Who and what art thou? In the solitude of the desert how often must the question have come to him, "Is the voice that thou hearest within thee calling thee out from the babel of other men's opinions and the routine of ordinary life? Is it a voice to be at all hazards obeyed? Or is it merely some illusive imagining of thy own? Who art thou that thou shouldst have a message to give, a service to perform?"

That question must have been asked and answered many times by John himself before it was asked by the Pharisees and answered to them. The answer was no uncertain one: "I am called to be a voice; my message is not my own. I have a witness for another."

His office was not a great or glorious one from one point of view. He was not the Christ whom the people were looking for. But his message could not be dispensed with; it was needed even by the Christ Himself before He could begin His own work.

It is, as was said before, a strange question to ask of anyone: "What sayest thou of thyself?" It might even be maintained that it is not a reasonable one to ask or to answer. How can an individual judge of himself? He cannot be an impartial judge of himself or of his own function in the world. All he can do is to work his work, to put himself in practice, so to speak, and then let the world say what place he shall hold. Self-estimation is bound to be one-sided, either too humble or too complacent in its reckoning. The individual must leave such questions and such questioners to take care of themselves and go on his way as best he can. All this might be said, and yet there is another side to this matter. Surely if the individual has a place in the large world, a part to play, it is hard if he himself is the only one who can never know it, if he is condemned to do what he has to do, forever unconscious of the why and the wherefore, like a subordinate actor in a play, who must come in and out at his appointed places, unknowing of how his coming or going affects the other actors or contributes to the plot as a whole. Surely in the drama of life the meanest actor may realize if he will what his function is; in fact, he can never rightly play even the smallest part without so doing.

The individual may not put aside the question, "What sayest thou of thyself?" He has to make clear to himself and to be willing to make clear to others what it is that he, in the solitude of his own inner being, has been called to and what the witness is that he is to bear to the world. He must know the part assigned to him.

It may be a much humbler part than that of the humble John the Baptist; he is not only not Elias and not "that prophet"; he is not the predicted "voice in the wilderness." But even the lowliest self must rise to be the self appointed him, and the humblest of God's creatures must bear the witness assigned him by his Maker.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

"WHERE THE BODY IS."

BY LINDLEY M. STEVENS.

The editorial of Fourth month 7th prompts the writer to call attention to another lesson which may be drawn from the passage from Matthew 24: 28.

Let us first read the passage in the connection given by Luke:

"In that night there shall be two men on one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. There shall be two women grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. And they answering say unto Him, Where, Lord? And He said unto them, Where the body is, thither will the eagles also be gathered together."

The "where" in our Lord's answer clearly refers to the place of gathering, and thus identifies the "where" of the question. Where are they taken, Lord, is the force of the inquiry. We would ask, Lord, where is heaven? Asked in various forms, it is the great question of the human race. The idea of immortality had struggled for light through the ages preceding Christ's time. In reading the Old Testament we do not always realize the gloom in which it was shrouded even to the pious Israelite. We read into many passages our own conviction borrowed from Christ's words and our Christian faith. Not to the Jew alone had the thought come to be rejected or accepted and believed, but all peoples had wrestled with the great problem. The human mind had been unable to separate the idea of eternal life from the thought of a place where that life was to be lived. Jesus himself had said that the beggar had been carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom; also, that the rich man lifted up his eyes in Hades. Would not the Master tell them something more of the abode of the dead? Perhaps He could have answered these pious Jews by some other saying. But He had come not only to be the glory of Israel but a light to lighten the Gentiles. His answer must surpass the thought of Abraham's bosom, must supplant the Hades of the Greeks, where pale ghosts wandered in shadow, crying: "This is not life, not life!"

The answer must reach forward and back through all ages. Hades, Swarga and Nirvana must vanish. The seventh heaven, the paradise of sensual delights, the halls of Odin, "the happy hunting ground beyond the setting sun," must be forgotten by him who would "be with me where I am." No description of a place would suffice for all these. Nothing but divine wisdom could shape the answer.

The disciples had seen the eagles come from specks in the blue from all quarters under heaven. They came straight to what was to them food and life. Who told the eagles "where"? Was it unrest to fly away? Was it sense acute beyond all human knowledge? They could not tell. Yet the eagles came unerringly. Where or wheresoever the body was, there were they gathered together.

The central lesson of the saying may be thus summed up. Those who have received the divine intuition shall know where to find the Christ. That this is the intended lesson is further shown by Matthew's seeming displacement of the text. "If therefore they shall say unto you, Behold he is in the wilderness, go not forth; behold he is in the inner chambers; believe it not." It will indeed be a time of gloom, but a light shall shine from beyond the natural horizon to illumine the clouds above you. As the eagle errs not, so you shall not fail to find the Christ.

Luke fastens upon the lesson with reference to the life beyond, and so inserts the saying where it seemed to him the Master meant it to apply. There is perfect harmony in the double application. In fact, it needs the double application to make the lesson complete. Those who have been led by intuition more than human to find the Christ amid the gloom and conflicting voices of earth are they who shall soar away as the eagle flies when the fetters of earth are removed. Where, Lord? Where the body is. The thought of a place, in any earthly sense of the word, vanishes in the thought of eternal life not bounded by anything comparable to the conditions of earth.

All later Scripture teems with this thought. "Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." "To depart and be with Christ." "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

Even when we are given a glimpse of that which is shown us lest our weak faith should fail to grasp the spiritual vision, the climax comes when "they shall see His face." A new heaven and a new earth is the work of Jesus Christ.

"I know not where His isles may lift
Their fronded palms in air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

"For though beyond the realm of time and space
The flood may bear me far,
I trust to see my pilot face to face
When I shall cross the bar."

Where beyond that meeting? But the eagles have flown straight away.

"BEHOLD I STAND AT THE DOOR AND KNOCK."

Charles Booth has lately bought the painting of the "Light of the World," by Holman Hunt, copied by the artist, or largely copied, from his earlier rendering of the same subject.

The earlier picture has been for some time the property of Keble College, Oxford, and though inaccessible to the multitude, it has grown familiar through the published engraving. Both copy and original share this interest, that they interpret, in the language of the painter's heart, a message that, conceived in the ardor of youth, has been confirmed in the ripeness of years.

Now, through the generous provision of the social reformer, responding to the painter's wish, thousands in England, Africa, Australia, New Zealand and America will see the real picture instead of its counterfeit.

The crowned figure still knocks and waits at the obdurate, weed-encumbered door. The soft shining of the harvest moon glimmers on grass and autumn leaves, adorned with the rare jewelling of the frost; but to all the well-remembered details there is given that touch of power which flows only from the wizardry of a master's brush.

The painted picture speaks with an intensity that an engraving cannot reach. The thousands who look upon the glowing canvas will hear in the awe of an inward stillness, not the message of the artist, but the vibrating speech of the lover of their souls: "Behold I stand at the door and knock." Indeed the quality of the picture lies not in its technical achievement, great or limited as that may be, but rather in its fidelity to a deep and universal truth. It touches a common chord. It throws into relief the pitiful failure, the sourness, nay, the aching loneliness of sin, and all the unquenched longing of the human heart.

Think of those who will see it!

The city man, turning aside for a moment to look at something that has been talked about, is arrested as it were in midcareer. His days given to stocks and shares, his evenings to billiards and the newspaper, his odds and ends of leisure to his family or his garden, his Sundays to the "river," a motor-car, or a novel and a pipe; he literally has no time for eternity! Bent upon the things that matter from minute to minute, he postpones and yet again postpones the things that matter forever. The city has case-hardened him.

But here is an appeal that pierces the self-deception of habit and convention, that searches forgotten recesses of the heart, that rankles in the conscience. "Behold I stand at the door and knock." And suddenly the scales fall. His successful career, his prosperity, shrivels to something very mean and little. Their substance is gone. He realizes that in spite of his name in the city, and his villa in the suburbs, he has nothing of which death cannot rob him. He has in fact nothing real. He has dropped the bone for the shadow. He knows that if disease, old age, failure, sorrow, come upon him, he is helpless, because he knows that the love of God is not in his heart. He has been burning his incense at an unworthy shrine and before an impotent god.

"... If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him, and he with me."

But how sup in an empty heart, how open the door upon its unswept poverty? And even now, as the minutes pass before this picture, the affairs of the market are pressing.

"He that overcometh, I will give to him to sit down with me in my throne, as I also overcame." As I also! The vision of the tempter from the mountain peak; the scourging pillar and the cross deliberately chosen with their suffering and shame. Must I too give up the world? "Behold I who suffered stand at the door of thy heart and knock."

We bring another to the picture.

He is young, but he has sinned—sinned to the flesh. The first purity is tarnished, the blight of sin—satiety—has fallen upon him. Life is all awry, its path encumbered with abandoned hopes, disappointed ambitions. It is not worth while to begin anything new, for there is no getting back behind the ugly memories of the past, no starting afresh without them. It is all a mockery, this life that tempts and then taunts and taunts forever with savage cruelty. "Behold I stand at the door and knock." Is it true? Is there a love like that? Yes! like that. Do you not see? You are young, but the ruined hut in the picture is the heart of an old man. The harvest moon is in the sky; the frost on the grass tells of winter; yet the Crowned Figure is knocking still. Must your life be like that life?—a ruin in old age, with selfishness strong-rooted in the soil of habit, binding fast the heart's one door—or shall He enter and sup with you, sweeten with the wonder of His passion the bitterness of the irredeemable years, and plant roses at your doorstep, which shall bloom at His second coming—bloom when, as death, He comes to take you home?

But there is another who approaches unbidden to the picture. She is the sufferer in a pathetic tragedy, a widow long before her time. She has little ones to cherish, but the years roll out before her with the undeviating monotony of a dusty road.

Her heart is heavy, the sunshine chills her, the home, with its silence and its memories, terrifies her; it is an impulse, scarcely an interest, that draws her here, "Behold I stand at the door and knock. Let me come into thy aching heart, into thy lonely life, and sup with thee. Thou hast suffered? See My chaplet of thorns, the wounds in My hands and side. Thou art lonely? I was in Gethsemane. God has forsaken thee? I was upon the cross. Daughter, I love thee, and My love is eternal. I and the Father are one. Cling close and trust thy human heart to Me."

Hackneyed illustrations, say you? That may be, but indifference, sin and sorrow make up, in no small measure, the travail of souls.

I incline to believe that Charles Booth has put the crown upon his many services in exhibiting this picture by Holman Hunt. He has reminded us, and we needed the reminder, that environment is not everything. Selfishness can grow even in a garden city, and though the gospel should teach us to build beautiful streets instead of slums, its real work is deeper. It was once pointed out to the artist that the door of the ruined hut has no handle. "No!" said Holman Hunt, "that door has no handle on the outside." Something must break within us, something hard and restrictive. Self-will must yield to love, and the door must be opened from within; our strength must become weakness, and our earthly pride divine humility, before He who knocks can bless our inward life with the sanctity of His holy presence.

"I was a stricken deer that left the herd
Long since—with many an arrow deep infix'd
My panting side was charged, when I withdrew
To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
There was I found by One, Who had Himself
Been hurt by the archers. In His side he bore,
And in His hands and feet, the cruel scars.
With gentle force soliciting the darts
He drew them forth and healed, and bade me live."

RIVERS OF LIVING WATER.

BY R. ELLA LEVERING.

"Now on the last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, . . . from within him shall flow rivers of living water. But this spake He of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive." (Jno 7: 37-39.)

Rivers of Living Water! What abundance! What sufficiency! What refreshing, and growth, and fruitfulness are suggested by the very words!

None but Jesus Christ could have made or inspired such a phrase, and none but He can bring to pass the precious truth which it represents.

To the woman whom Jesus met at Jacob's well He spoke of "Living Water." He let her know that He had it to give for the asking. Its wondrously satisfying quality He told in never-to-be forgotten words, "He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

How simply told! What strong encouragement! What fulness of satisfaction for the individual believer throughout time and eternity is here made known!

Our present text goes still farther in its showing of the work of divine grace, in that the believer is represented as a fountain, from which flow rivers of this same living water. It has marvelously satisfied his own thirsty life, and now rivers of it flow out from him to bless the otherwise barren deserts of humanity.

This is not the only Scripture in which the heart of man is represented as a fountain.

What a contrast to "rivers of living water" is given in Mark 7: 21-23! What a Saviour is He who can change a fountain of evil thoughts, murders, covetousness, pride, deceit and blasphemy into a fountain of living water! "This spake He of the Spirit." O that again and constantly it might be said of all who call themselves disciples of Jesus, "They were all filled with the Holy Ghost," and spake "as the Spirit gave them utterance." O that after a heart and life is filled with the Holy Ghost His gentle promptings might never be disregarded or quenched!

He was not given in the first Pentecost until Jesus was glorified, and the same condition is necessary to His filling any individual believer. Has Jesus Christ been given His place in thy life? Does thy whole heart go out joyfully to Him, saying,

"With full consent, thine would I be,
And own thy sovereign right in me"?

Then will the sweet incoming of the Holy Ghost be known. O then, beloved, you will begin to know the springing up of a fountain of "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance," the outflowing of which will constitute "rivers of living water."

This is a missionary text. What is it that causes the darkness and degradation, the horrible and sickening abandonment of countries where Jesus Christ is not known? Is it not just this, that there are no fountains or rivers of living water? Men, instead of being sources of light and blessing to each other, have become centers of evil thoughts, adulteries, murders, thefts, deceit, and such like.

What need then that men, transformed by grace and bearing the "fruit of the Spirit," should be scattered abroad in the deserts of iniquity, where perishing multitudes will be brought to life if only the living water can reach their lips! And what worse than folly that any should go to them, thinking to meet their need with anything short of the Spirit's anointing!

"Rivers of living water" flow in endless channels. Once started, neither time nor distance can stop their course of blessing. Those which flowed out from the hearts of Paul and Peter and John, and are preserved for us in the Bible are as sweet and refreshing as at the start. Those which came from the hearts and pens of holy men and women of Fox's or Wesley's time, are to-day full of power to encourage the believer or the seeker after God. The same can be said of those expressions of spiritual truth which have come from any heart yielded to God for His possession. Many, whose words have been forgotten, are bearing fruit in the faith and joy of many disciples.

Herein lies a privilege and grave responsibility which resolves itself into the opportunity and sweet necessity of being always right with God and "filled with the Spirit"; for the Holy Ghost is given to those that obey God.

ON RECEIVING GOOD THINGS WITH JOY.

BY F. B. MEYER.

"Every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be rejected, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified through the word of God and prayer."—1 Tim. 4: 4.

This was one of Paul's last Epistles. It is supposed that it was written after he had been emancipated from his two years' confinement in his hired house; that leaving Rome he went again to the East, spending some time at Ephesus, Crete and elsewhere; and that it was during these journeys that this Epistle, which shows the mellowness and ripeness of his nature, was indited to his son Timothy. A good deal of what had been strong and hard had passed away beneath the touch of life's sorrows and the Spirit of God, and now, as Paul the aged, he gives his last counsel, not only to the young Timothy, but to young men and maidens, and, indeed, to all Christian people everywhere. It is in this strain, the autumn life of a great and good man, that he utters these words. May they be written upon our hearts so as never to be forgotten, but to serve as the moulding principle of our after-life.

In this paragraph there are two principles to which the apostle alludes: the one which he repudiates, the other which he adopts. He describes certain men who forbid to marry and insist on abstinence from certain meats and drinks. Speaking of these, he uses their position as a foil, in order to show that in Jesus Christ there is something better—the position of accepting whatever God creates, and accepting it with thanksgiving. The word thanksgiving is Eucharist—so often used of the Holy Communion; and if you understand the principle of this verse, you will find your whole life become a Eucharist—a thanksgiving service.

Let us for a moment consider the position which the apostle repudiates—that of prohibition, of those who forbid to marry and command to abstain. It was this that actuated the hermit of the early Church. He withdrew himself from the world of men, and in some lonely cave spent his days and nights. Unloved, unattended, and alone, he must live and die, prohibited from home and friendship, from other men's meat and drink, and from the ordinary avocations of human life. The Puritan, also, was full of prohibitions. He frowned upon the joys of men, and looked askance at much which we hold almost necessary to the regimen of a true life or culture of our nature. And this spirit runs through the life of many of us who would not range ourselves with the hermit or the Puritan. We are always afraid of good things. If God places a cup in our hand, brimming with happiness, we put it to our lips with a trembling grasp, and dread lest we may be having too much happiness. We never expect to have a day of perfect pleasure; we think it would be too good to hope for; there will always be some freckle in the lily, some thorn in the rose, some cloud in the sky. When we take our joys it is with foreboding. We tread the happy path with fear. Or if we let ourselves go, and have one long blessed day; if we let ourselves go into a friendship, and drink and drink again; if we allow ourselves to delight in some avocation, accomplishment, or interest, we always fear that there will be a rebate; and that after some days or weeks have passed, God, who cannot trust us with too much joy, will see to it that our life is plunged in gloom and sorrow to make an equivalent.

If there be a burst of sunshine we go about the world, saying: "You may depend upon it, we shall have to pay for this." This spirit is perpetually casting a shadow over our happiest days. The mother takes the little child in a perfect ecstasy to her bosom, but as she looks upon its face she says to herself: "I must not be too happy, for fear God will take him away." The young man who recognizes his twin soul says to himself: "I must not be too happy, for such happiness as this cannot last." This is the way so many of us go through life—afraid to drink the cups of joy, which are ready in our hand.

There is another phase of this same experience—we have shut ourselves up with our sorrow. And yet the darkest day that ever came had some alleviation; the saddest hour that ever struck had something in it to make life possible; but too often we wrap the mantle of grief around our person, and, although the child's hand reaches out its flowers, although the sky sends down a glint of smiling sunshine, although there are wafts to us of some beautiful burst of music, which should lift us up on its wing, we shut ourselves up in our sorrow and say: No, we are too down and dull today to be able to entertain and accept joy.

On the contrary, Paul says: Everything which God has made is beautiful, and is not to be refused if it be received with thanksgiving. It is obvious, therefore, that we have here a principle to help us. It is better to lay down as few rules as possible, and to enunciate great principles, because so often, if you lay down arbitrary rules for people, you simply drive them to revolt; whilst if you will only enunciate great principles which they can apply for themselves to their whole life, you make them strong and independent. "You can make a rule, but not a principle; you can lay down a rule, but not a principle; you can establish a rule, but not a principle." A principle is there before you come, and all you can do is to discover and apply it. That is why the New Testament is a book of man's life. It does not deal with rule and regulation, but with principle.

LETTERS FROM JAPAN.

Mary P. E. Nitobe, a former Philadelphian, daughter of Joseph S. Elkinton, now residing in Japan, has written several letters to her brother on the temper of the Japanese. Her husband, Dr. Inazo Nitobe, has charge of the Agricultural Department of Formosa. Dr. Nitobe is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University, and he also took honors at Halle. Dr. Nitobe's Johns Hopkins thesis, "Intercourse Between the United States and Japan," was very highly praised. He also edited a volume entitled "Bushido," the feudal spirit of Japan.

Kyoto, Second month 17th, 1904.—If Russia were of the same spirit as Japan, they would fight out the war quickly and be done with it; but it is well said that Russia is the most Oriental of European countries, and it is evidently her fixed intention to delay and retire, whereas Japan would carry out her end of it according to the most up-to-date requirements of international policy.

The whole nation feels the responsibility of this war most tremendously. The intensity of patriotic purpose is beyond understanding, unless one is directly in touch with it. It permeates the lowest stratum of society, and there are naturally many pathetic and soul-stirring incidents. An old peasant woman spent two whole nights and a day at a station here in Kyoto for a glimpse of her grandson. In that time some forty trains laden with soldiers passed. She had interested the stationmen in her behalf, and so as each train came up one of the men shouted out the name of her beloved grandson, until at last he was found. She bade him farewell, and gave him 20 yen, telling him she did not know anything about the country to which he was going, but wherever he went she wanted him to use it for his pleasure. One soldier was seen holding a child in one arm and a watch in the other hand, his wife weeping behind him, while he said to his child (about four or five years old), "Look at your father! You have just twenty minutes to look at him. Look at me well! I don't want you to forget me."

Somehow every man goes forth with the determination and even expectation of leaving "his bones on the plains of Manchuria." This absolute surrender of life will carry them through the most desperate struggle. But I saw the other day an expression which carries an awful weight of truth—"the glacier-like movement of Russia." May she not slowly congeal her brave antagonist. The feeling is that Japan is fighting the battles of Europe and America, though we very much doubt whether she gains much for herself in the end, beyond a record for supreme bravery. I don't mean that we anticipate defeat—rather a fearfully hard-won victory; and then the selfishness of the nations, and the silly old cry of a “yellow peril” to secure for themselves the best of it all.

Tokyo, Third month 17th.—Kyoto is delightful in its beauty and its historical interests, but one feels nearer at the center of present-day life here in Tokyo. Yesterday, for instance, I went to the Tsuda's school to hear the wife of Major Wood talk about her introduction at the Chinese Court. She was wonderfully impressed with the magnetism and two-fold character of that fascinating old woman, the Empress Dowager of China, who chose to show to them only the gentlest, most charming side of her character. Her voice was the most beautiful human voice that Major Wood's wife had ever heard—having the clear tones of a bell. After returning from China, the ladies Wood and MacDonald were dining together and fell into a dispute about this, Lady MacDonald declaring that it was a voice like a trombone, when a gentleman of the diplomatic corps present said that he had once heard the Empress conversing for two hours, when he thought her voice the most melodious he had ever listened to, with the same wonderful bell-like tones which had so impressed others. Just as he passed from the audience chamber something, he knew not what, angered her, and she raged like a tempest in a voice of which he could not have believed a woman capable. And so it is with this remarkable two-fold nature that she has cast a spell where she will, or has tyrannized and slain as her mood and ambition have dictated, until, as one has remarked, she has become the “greatest female despot the world perhaps has ever known,” holding in her hands the destinies of four hundred million subjects, and the Emperor a mere puppet at her feet.

I have a chance to know what this war costs the Japanese combatants personally, as well as the sufferings of their families, and it is most heart-rending, and yet all are so quiet. I went yesterday to see the young brother and sister of the Nambu family, over whom my heart yearns very tenderly, and I wanted to send two warm “jerseys” to their brother, who has gone to the front. They don't know where he is. That is the way the military secrets are kept. The husbands and brothers and sons tell nothing of proposed movements. Even Marchioness Oyama knows nothing until “the special” announces something accomplished, and when the newsboy's shout and bell intimate fresh war news, Marquis Oyama may say, “That may be the report of such and such a battle.” Dear me! I wish the day for battles were long past. The Ladies' Patriotic Association has asked me to become a member. But it brings me to a point of self-searching and clear expression as regards war, and my dear little friend Sudo went with me to tell the lady through whom the invitation came just where I stand; that my ancestors for two hundred and fifty years had taken a firm position against war, and I explained the ground upon which they stood—even at great personal sacrifice—their reasons for so doing; that I felt theirs was the right view of the problem, and with killing I could have nothing to do. The sick and wounded, and destitute families I would gladly help as far as I could, upon humanitarian grounds, especially in educating children and trying to do my mite along normal lines to study the land and keep it from the inevitable exhaustion which follows war. A mite indeed! But it is where my interest lies, and for such things I might be called upon. She understood far better than I had dared to hope, and so did the dear old man Ota. Indeed the men who know what battle really means are easier to talk with and they comprehend one's convictions better than some who have had less experience and have drunk less deeply of the cup of sorrow.

Tokyo, Fourth month 6th.—The temper of the nation is something which is one of the most amazing things, yes, I think the most amazing thing I have ever known. People talk about Japan wanting war. Japan did not want war. There was a fiery element, of course; but the nation did not want war any more than my husband did when he said it would inevitably come. Japan would have been thankful to arbitrate if she had felt Europe would sincerely make an effort to see fair play and in such a mood would insist on arbitration. But she has had no reason to think such a thing would be done, and she knew that it would only be that persistent “glacier movement” of Russia until her turn would come to be crushed and ground to dust, probably at such a time that she could not resist. Japan has done her level best. There isn't a flaw in her ante-bellum proceedings. Everybody here feels that this war is a struggle for her very life, and I tell thee, the men and women are sober—tremendously under the weight of the responsibility of war, the after condition of the nation and the length of the struggle.

The carriage of the soldiers is most impressive. I met thousands of them as I came up from Kyoto, and the deep thinking many of them were doing was what struck me most. In California I saw our “boys” go off to the Philippines, and I never saw a train stop but that scores tumbled pell-mell out of the cars and rushed for the saloon. I have not here seen one soldier do the same. At every eating-station the order was perfect. A lady told me she had met train after train-load of them at Okayama and helped to serve them at the station, and that she had seen only one man intoxicated. But they go forth to die—I mean their spirit is that of the utmost determination to win or never return from battle. The general of the first division told his men that he expected never to return, and that they must go with the same willingness and determination.

Of course the newspaper correspondents chafe because they are not allowed to go to the front, but Col. Crowder, one of the military attachés sent out by the United States Government to watch the progress of the war, said the Japanese Government was all right in this, and he further said that at the time of the Franco-Prussian War, Von Moltke took Metz upon information he received of the movements of the French army through the London newspapers; and that during the campaign in the Philippines General Funston and two other officers were sent out with a detachment of troops to do a difficult piece of work in the interior, and the commanding general knew that these three officers only had knowledge of what they were to do. What was his surprise to find news of their destination all over Manila as soon as they had gone. He investigated its source and found that General Funston had told his wife, and it had "leaked," and word had been telegraphed at once to the United States papers and as quickly sent back. After that the General said no one but himself should know until beyond possibility of "leaking."

I was much impressed by Professor Kumamoto's spirit this morning. He said, "Of course I want Japan to be victorious; but really in my heart I care most for what will be the effect upon Russia, if we win. I think our victory will open her eyes to right government and do her good," and he was sincere. The earnest sincerity of Japan's sense of the importance of her mission in the development of the Far East is at once interesting and striking. There is intensity of feeling but deep gravity and steady determination.

As a member of the Red Cross Association my friend went to the station at Okayama to wait upon the officers and men, by one of whom she was asked to speak with the major. During their conversation he suddenly said to her, "Do you pray to God?" "Yes, I pray to Him every day." "Will you pray for us?" "I do pray for you every day. I belong to a band of mothers, and we agreed every morning upon waking to think of the army and pray for you." Then she added, "Are you a Christian?" "No; I'm not a Christian or a Buddhist; I have no time to think of religion." "But you are willing to be prayed for?" "Yes!" Afterwards she passed on to the platform to see the troops off, and a soldier beckoned to her. She hesitated to go forward, as there were many people there, and it seemed conspicuous. Then he leaned out of the window and said, "Please come!" and she went. He asked for the little Japanese flag she wore. She told him it would be only a bother to him, and that he couldn't really want it. He urged her to let him have it, and she asked, "Why do you want it?" His answer was, "I have overheard your conversation with the officer, and I feel that if I have this little flag to look at I may realize that you are praying for us." Thou may be sure she gave it and put it in his button-hole herself. Then she saw him moving about the train—as it afterwards proved—for a piece of paper, and in a few moments he handed her a poem he had written. The Japanese who translated it said it was beautifully written, and it read as follows: "With the same peace that the Sakura floats to meet its death, my soul goes to meet death in battle." I may say that the absence of decay and the gentle, breezy death of the sakura flower—its petals flowing gently to mother-earth—are particularly attractive to the Samurai, and it is their emblem. Then in a day or two my friend received a long and most interesting letter from Hiroshima. It was from this same youth and gave her his history. Of particular interest was his request for forgiveness, because he had always been opposed to Christianity, and had thought what the newspapers said about the sympathy of foreigners was simply newspaper trash; that she was the first foreigner with whom he had ever spoken, and that if he returned from the war, as he now began to hope he might, if she prayed for him, he wished to come to her and learn of Christianity and take it back to his father and mother as the best "returning-gift" he could carry to them.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

OUR SPIRITUAL BODIES.

BY ALIX.

As we stand in the studio of a great sculptor and gaze in wonder at the creations of his imagination carved in imperishable marble, should we not realize that day by day we also are carving in a still more imperishable material. Is it not true that each man is the sculptor of his own soul? The soul that is to be criticised in the light of immortality by the "saints" that are to "judge the world."

This spiritual body of ours is no impalpable essence, but a very real body, that is to exist throughout the ages of eternity—it is, in fact, our personality. The earthly body is only the case in which it is enclosed.

Death can work no change in it—death has no purifying power. Its only office is to sever the connection between the earthly and the spiritual.

Into whatever shape we have carved that spiritual part of us is the shape it must bear throughout eternity. Nor are we the artists alone of our own lives. We have much to do in carving the spiritual lives of others, frequently those who are most closely connected with us.

The passionate word that calls forth an angry rejoinder, the sneering remark that upsets the faith of another, the unjust accusation that arouses bitterness and hatred, the censorious speech that infuses its subtle venom into another's heart, sometimes makes of the family relation, that God inaugurated as a means of helpfulness, only a source of temptation.

Truly may it often be said "A man's foes are those of his own household."

If through a hasty blow the child in a home should be blinded, deafened, crippled, how deep would be the regret, how keen the remorse of the parent that dealt the blow. And yet the little child, so carefully tended, so lovingly cherished, may go into eternity spiritually blinded, deafened, crippled, through the carelessness or criminality of those who have it in charge.

We cannot evade the responsibility of living. God has entrusted us with the forming of our own souls and the souls of others, and this present world is the workshop in which they are to be prepared for the life eternal, which is the portion of every one of us.

Under this responsibility we would surely sink were it not that the great Master Workman is ever by our side, aiding, directing, encouraging and setting his seal of approbation upon our feeble efforts to carry out His will.

FRIENDS AT HIGH POINT, NORTH CAROLINA.

The accompanying cut represents the Friends' new meeting house at High Point, N. C.

The Friends there have been using the yearly meeting house, which is located in the outskirts of the city, inconvenient to the membership and to the public generally. More than a year ago a lot was purchased in the very heart of the city, and work was undertaken at once. The building was completed and the house dedicated on Fourth month 3, at the time of the Yearly Meeting Conference of Ministers and Workers, which began two days previously.

The house is built of granite, is 36x70 feet, with main audience room 36x50, with gallery over the vestibule.

The Sabbath School room is in the basement, which is fitted up in excellent order, with a main room 36x36, with four class rooms and a furnace and toilet rooms. Two Friends who have traveled over most of the civilized world—one says: "It is the handsomest Friends' church in the world;" the other says: "It is the prettiest house of worship I ever saw." We simply say: "Praise the Lord for His blessing upon our efforts."

Several have already expressed their desire to find the Saviour, or to know Him better, since our opening five weeks ago.

Eli Reece has been pastor here for two and a half years, and to his untiring efforts and a united membership is largely due the success of the undertaking.

The following is the report of the Soliciting and Building Committee:

Cost of lot	$2,000.00
Cost of building, including furnace, electric lighting, plumbing	6,433.47
Total	$8,433.47
Amount subscribed by Friends ..	$5,997.47
Amount subscribed by the public in High Point	2,436.00
	$8,433.47

This entire amount was raised in North Carolina, and nearly all in High Point.

On the day of the dedication $485 was subscribed with which to adequately seat the house.

High Point is situated on the main line of the Southern Railway in Guilford County, North Carolina. It is the greatest furniture manufacturing center in the South. It has a population of about 6,500, the finest public school in the State and one of the finest hotels.

There has never been a saloon in the city, the charter forbidding it. It is a great center for young men who come to work in the factories, and are hence away from home; for this reason we have arranged to have two rooms of our new church open to young men each evening of the week.

Friends desiring to come South for the winter, or to make a permanent home, will find a welcome and a chance to work in the Lord's harvest fields.

There is room enough on earth to find graves for the finest abilities and noblest powers. The ground which received one talent will also receive the five. Every man can be his own sexton. You can easily find a spade to dig a grave for your talents and abilities, your money and your time. But understand that in burying your talent you are burying yourself; in burying aught that God has given you, you are burying part of your very life.—Joseph Parker.

"It is what a man might have been which jars on what he is. When a man has once stood on the Mount of Vision, when he has once heard the call of God to his soul and made answer, 'Here am I,' he can never go back to dwell in the valley of commonplace. The miasma there, to which ordinary men have become immune, is deadly to him.—From Maud Wilder Goodwin's 'Four Roads to Paradise.'"

Let us be clear-souled enough to look through and behind the present connection of life and pain, and know that, in its essence, life is not pain, but joy.—Phillips Brooks.

TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS, OF PHILADELPHIA
YEARLY MEETING.

All communications should be addressed to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Editor, 343 E. Main Street, Haddonfield, N. J.

The meeting of the Executive Committee of the Temperance Association of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held on the 23d instant. The attendance has been large, the interest on the increase and the work accomplished above the average year in results. There is an excellent supply of literature in the temperance closet at 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

The Hepburn-Dolliver bill, which solicited the interest of the temperance people during the past session of Congress, was reported favorably by the committee, but Congress adjourned before action was taken.

"The liquor men have brought their national organizers into Pennsylvania, and are organizing everywhere to go before the next Legislature to destroy the remonstrance feature in the Brooks High License Law. To oppose this the Anti-Saloon League wishes to organize a great local option movement in the State. By means of the remonstrance feature the League had obtained 550 rejections of applications for licenses in Allegheny County and 250 in Luzerne County."

The Catholic bishops of Ireland, in a joint letter, say:

"To drink we may refer almost all the crimes by which this country is disgraced. Drink has wrecked more homes than ever fell beneath the crowbar brigade in the worst days of eviction; it has filled more graves and made more widows and orphans than did the famine, and it has broken more hearts and blighted more hopes and rent asunder family ties more recklessly than the enforced exile of emigrants."

In speaking of young men's chances in life, Bishop Willard F. Mallalieu said: "There is one quality without which no man, no matter how ambitious, how gifted or how strong, can ever hope to amount to anything in life, and that one quality is sobriety."

"I realize, of course, that this quality alone is not enough to secure success, but it is safe to say that without it success is absolutely unattainable."

"The greatest danger to young men is the drink habit."

"Let young men from all over our broad and glorious heritage take the pledge to destroy the traffic and the habit, and, as the years go on, resist and trample under their feet every enticement and allurements to violate their sacred pledge, and thus many of them will live to see this nation of ours become the joy of the whole earth."

"Save the youth and the nation will be saved; save the nation and the millions of all the nations will be saved."

In the year of 1862 Eli and Sybil Jones attended yearly meeting in London, and the latter "spoke out her feelings" in regard to total abstinence. She was probably the first person who publicly stated to an English audience the necessity of taking such high ground to overcome the evils of intemperance, and, though much sympathy was expressed, there was a deep feeling on the part of some against her expressed views. She writes: "Some, it may be hoped, were led to examine how far their example of righteousness and temperance had reached to give a check to the crying sin of this nation, that not only their husbands and brothers be influenced by their example, but also their neighbors, and whether there was not something for them to do in this matter, even total abstinence." This query was made by one of God's anointed servants, just fifty-two years ago, and is it not pertinent to the present day?

As a result of a census of church and saloon attendance in London, conducted by W. T. Stead, it was a tragic showing. Out of 142,000 persons known to live in Paddington, only 8,000 men, 16,000 women and 7,000 children entered a church on the Sabbath of the census. This total of 31,000 was even considerably better than the facts, for each entrance of a church was counted, without regard to whether a person attended more than once. But the same method was adopted in the enumeration of the saloon attendants, and it is probable that there was much more repeating in the case of the saloons than of the churches. Eighty-three thousand men and boys went into saloons, ten times the number that went to church, and 12,000 more than is the whole number of men and boys in the district—an indication of what the repeating must have been. Among the women the figures, though smaller, are even more disheartening, for against the 16,000 that went to church 28,000 went into saloons.

To enter a London bar does not mean necessarily drunkenness or dissipation; nor, unhappily, does the entrance of a church mean righteousness. Yet each act has a sociological tendency that is perfectly understood, and the two typify fairly well—and probably in the most convenient way—the forces that make respectively for a lower and higher standard of life in the community. Viewed thus dispassionately, there is still given a depressing glimpse into the "abyss" of London.

THE CASE STATED.

The argument for no license may be concisely stated in four propositions:

1. The business interests of our country demand the suppression of their worst foe—the saloon.
2. The interests of American homes demand the suppression of their worst foe—the saloon.
3. The political liberty of our country demands the suppression of its worst foe—the saloon.
4. The conscience of the country demands that the attitude of government toward the foe of business, home, and liberty, should be one of uncompromising hostility.

The day is coming when the American people will look back to these saloon days as the darkest page in national annals.

PATENT MEDICINE.

The people who drink or eat patent medicines number millions. Some do it to save doctors' bills, others because they find the patent medicine more effective, since no reputable doctor would give in quantity and kind what the patent medicine contains. Beer contains from 2 to 5 per cent. of alcohol. Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound contains 20.6 per cent. of alcohol; Paine's Celery Compound, 21; Ayer's Sarsaparilla, 26.2; Hood's Sarsaparilla, 18.8; Vinol, 28.5; Parker's Tonic, 41.6; Boker's Stomach Bitters, 42.6; Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, 44.3; Warner's Safe Tonic Bitters, 35.7, and so on, through a long list given by Editor Bok, which all who are their own doctors may read in the "Ladies' Home Journal" for May. Opium, digitalis and other powerful drugs also add to the power of these "medicines" by which drunkards are formed and babies are poisoned at the breast. Nothing succeeds like success, and a person who has been cheered by one of these compounds goes about enthusiastically urging it on his friends. Much virtue in a name. Call a mixture by some moral title and thousands will swallow and advocate it who would hesitate at absinthe or raw gin.

AN EDUCATOR ON SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

H. R. Pattengill, one of Michigan's most widely-known and popular educators, in a recent editorial in Michigan State teachers' paper, "Moderator Topics," said:

"Temperance teaching in our schools has been of incalculable benefit. Let the work everywhere be kept up to a high standard. The physiologies of to-day do not overdo the subject one whit. Teachers, don't be sidetracked in your work by the emissaries of saloons. By overwhelming preponderance the scientific and medical experts of to-day stamp the use of alcoholic beverages as dangerous and damaging to body, mind and soul. But we don't need experts to tell us this. Evidences are all about us. Horrible object lessons are all too plentiful. The past winter has been prolific in examples of the effects of alcohol. Teach the subject just as dispassionately, vigorously and thoroughly as you do any other of the school subjects. Let the youth understand that he smirches his reputation by entering a saloon.

"Many of our great railways and mercantile establishments are barring out all drinkers of intoxicants. Old soakers may be beyond our reach; but, teachers, do your level best to save the boys.

"British physicians, 15,000 strong, petition for compulsory temperance education. It's about time, with 939 of every 1,000 people dying paupers, and drink the cause of 75 per cent. of it."

A STRONG TEMPERANCE ARGUMENT.

Intoxicating liquors used by the people of this country last year cost $1,242,943,118, according to the trustworthy figures of the "American Grocer." This was 19.98 gallons or an expense of $18.15 for each man, woman and child in the country; or if we estimate that only one in four drink intoxicants, each one of these paid out $62.16 for hurtful drinks, and consumed 79.92 gallons of that which gratifies only a depraved appetite and harms body, mind and soul. The figures show that there is a steady increase in the use of intoxicating liquors, the consumption having almost doubled in the last twenty-three years. It is interesting to compare the cost of intoxicants with that of other beverages. Coffee cost the people $156,690,261, tea $45,000,000 and cocoa $7,000,000. As a matter of fact, the money spent for intoxicating liquors would provide food sufficient to sustain one-fourth of our population in health and vigor, or, taking again the estimate of one in four as users of intoxicants, each one spends as much for liquor as would be needed to provide him food. Considering not only its immediate cost, but its results in destroying health and increasing crime, the drinking of intoxicating liquors is economically, socially and morally the worst evil which afflicts the nation.

THE SALOON MUST GO.

The saloon must go, or law will go.

The saloon lives by law, and by law it must die.

Vice is to be prohibited, let the difficulties in executing the law be what they may.—Lord Chesterfield.

The saloon is the high school of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The school-room is ennobling; the bar-room is ignobling.

Nothing noble is born of the liquor traffic.—John G. Holland.

Pulverize the rum power and you empty prisons and police-stations.

Under the malign influence of the saloon in municipal affairs, demagogues leap into power, and subordinate public good to the management of the criminal classes.

Saloon-rule in large cities is making government a farce and a failure.

As the saloon in politics outlaws moral men, will not moral men outlaw the saloon?

The shot that crimsoned Iowa soil with Haddock's blood resounded through the land, and "Death to the saloon" fills the air.

There is but one infallible remedy for this great evil; the liquor traffic must be outlawed.

Alcohol is the home destroyer. Total abstinence the home preserver.

There is only one unconquerable sin, and that is the sin you are not trying to conquer.—Amos R. Wells.

The International Lesson.

SECOND QUARTER.

LESSON XI.

SIXTH MONTH 12, 1904.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

Mark 15: 22-39.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures.—1 Cor. 15: 3.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 6.—Christ crucified. Mark 15: 22-39.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 7.—Luke's account. Luke 23: 33-49.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 8.—King of the Jews. John 19: 13-22.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 9.—"It is finished." John 19: 23-30.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 10.—The burial. John 19: 31-42.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 11.—Reconciled by Christ. 2 Cor. 5: 14-21.

First-day, Sixth mo. 12.—For sinners. Rom. 5: 1-11.

Time.—Sixth-day, A.D. 30, 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Place.—Calvary, just outside the walls of Jerusalem. The exact site is not determined. The traditional site is the one which was settled upon in the days of Constantine. It was probably north of the Damascus gates.

Parallel accounts, Matt. 27: 32-56; Luke 23: 26-49; John 19: 16-37.

The lesson describes the most solemn event in history, and should be studied reverentially, and with some sense of the momentous issues involved. The account of the events between the last lesson and the present should be read.

23. "And they offered him wine mingled with myrrh." R. V. This was doubtless the common sour wine of the country. It has been stated that the myrrh was added to stupefy, but this has no confirmatory evidence. "He received it not." He was unwilling to take anything which would lessen the suffering.

24. "And they crucify him, and part his garments among them, casting lots upon them what each should take." R. V. The cross was usually raised just enough to bring the feet above the ground, but from verse 36 it would seem that in the present case it was somewhat higher. "The victim was placed upon the cross, his hands and feet were fastened upon it by nails, while the body was supported by pegs fastened into the wood between the legs. Then the cross was raised and put into place. The dividing the clothes of the victim among the executioners was a common practice. Crucifixion was a Roman punishment; it was one of the most cruel and painful of all methods of putting to death.

25. "Third hour." This was about 9 o'clock in the morning.

26. The superscription is given differently in each of the accounts, that of Mark being the shortest; each has the important words, "King of the Jews," which was the charge upon which sentence was asked. It was customary to put a tablet stating the reason for the execution on the cross where a criminal was executed.

27. "Two robbers." R. V. This is the correct translation. They were bandits rather than thieves. Why they should have been crucified at this time is not stated—possibly to associate Jesus with real criminals, and so give the idea that He was one also.

28. This verse is a quotation from Isaiah 53: 12, but it is not found in the best manuscripts, and is omitted in the Revised Version.

29, 30. The place of execution was generally near a thoroughfare, so that passers-by might be duly impressed by the result of committing crime. The railing referred to Christ's words. John 2: 19; Mark 14: 58.

31. They could not deny His miracles, but they could not understand why He did not save Himself. As He did not save Himself, therefore His claims must be false. They did not understand the act of sublime self-sacrifice for the sake of others.

32. They said, If His claims are real, let Him now come down, for if He is the Messiah He can do it. They could not see that if He did come down He would not be the real Messiah. "And they that were crucified with him reproached him." R. V. Luke (23: 39-43) says that only one took part in the reproaching, and that the other expressed in a wonderful manner his faith in Jesus, and received the reward of his faith.

33. "Sixth hour." Twelve o'clock noon. "Darkness over the whole land." This could not have been an eclipse, but was miraculous. How far the darkness extended is not known.

34. "Ninth hour." Three o'clock in the afternoon. The Hebrew words are a quotation from Psalm 22: 1. The Hebrew means not actual withdrawal or desertion, but withdrawal of help. He was not really forsaken, though it seemed so.

35. As Jesus used Aramaic, and the Roman soldiers knew nothing about Elijah, the verse must refer to Jews who stood by. The probability is that these heard indistinctly.

36. The only way he could give liquid. "Vinegar," the sour wine of the country. The act was evidently a merciful one, and was done with good intentions. "Let alone." This shows there was some opposition to the act. Compare Matt. 27: 49.

37. "And Jesus uttered a loud voice, and gave up the ghost." Luke says He also said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

38. The veil or curtain of the Temple was that which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. This rending signified the removal of the separation between God and the people, and making direct access to His presence possible. Compare Heb. 9 and 10: 19-23.

39. The centurion was probably a heathen. He did not regard Jesus as the Son of God in the Christian sense, but as a son of God, a hero according to the heathen ideas. Luke says that he exclaimed, "Certainly this was a righteous man."

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Oh, it was wonderful; how could it be?"

Dying for me, dying for me."

2. Mark 10: 45.

Christian Endeavor

TOPIC FOR SIXTH MONTH TWELFTH.

WHAT I MUST DO TO BECOME CHRIST'S DISCIPLE.

Matt. 16: 24-26; John 13: 33-35.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 6.—Forsaking all. Luke 14: 25-33.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 7.—Following Christ. John 1: 35-39.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 8.—Suffering with Christ. Matt. 10: 22-23.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 9.—Like little children. Mark 10: 13-16.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 10.—Men of prayer. Mark 9: 14-29.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 11.—Keeping His word. John 8: 26-31.

Judaism required of its followers certain outward observances, intended to direct and influence the spiritual life. When Christ came He found the form exalted and the purpose lost sight of. In His teaching He reversed the order and seeks for the cleansing of the heart, out of which are the issues of life, because when it is right the outward life will be controlled and shaped by it.

In becoming Christians men only take the places for which they were intended, and it is this that makes the returning prodigal so true a picture of the sinner of all lands and times. We have gone away from the Father's house, and His love, following, has at last reached us in our need; the hunger of heart can be satisfied with only what He has to give. As long as we have a margin of capital to put in with His gifts to support a degree of personal credit for ourselves we are holding Him off. It is only when we know that all our righteousness is filthy rags that we are ready for His cleansing and the wedding garment that He gives. "I am nothing; Christ is all" must be the spirit of the genuine seeker and the true Christian.

God invites us to prove Him, but we cannot experiment in any uncertain, tentative way. He is the abundant supply of our needs, but to receive what He has for us we must ask in faith, nothing doubting. Men who believe one another and venture property and life itself on that belief withhold their trust from Him, yet no human enterprise is so guaranteed as this undertaking which He proposes for us.

The evidences are all about us, and He is ready to give the witness to us also; if we do not have it it is because we have failed in some duty of our own. An evangelist tells of a young man who felt himself accepted at an evening service, whom he found a few days later sitting in deep distress among the inquirers. In response to a question he said he had been too hasty; there had been no change. "No, sir," said the evangelist; "that is not the reason, but you have not confessed Christ." The young man was startled that the answer should be so positive and so exact, but acknowledged that he had deferred telling his Christian mother of his conversion until he had doubted it. On being shown his error he renewed his vow. The next night he was found again in the inquiry room, but this time praying with another. "How is it now?" asked the evangelist. He looked up with a smile that answered, and said, "I told mother."

"Them that honor me I will honor."

Educational.

EARLHAM COLLEGE.

In addition to the new members of the Earlham College faculty for 1904-5, which have already been noted in these columns, Gertrude H. Beggs, of Yale University, has been elected head of the department of Greek language and literature. During recent years the department of Greek has been growing, and the securing of Professor Beggs is certainly a distinct contribution to the work in ancient classics in Indiana. Professor Seymour, of Yale, regards her as one of the two strongest women who have been in the department of Greek since his connection with the University. Professor Beggs has had an unusually successful record as a teacher, both in High School and University work, and takes her Ph.D. degree at Yale in Sixth month.

Mary E. Woodard has resigned her position as lady principal after three years of very successful work. Sarah P. Rogers, Earlham, 1900, of Toronto, Canada, who has made special investigation of ladies' dormitories in the East, has been secured as lady principal and assistant in German. She was very popular as a student, and has a brilliant record in modern languages.

Professor Allen D. Hole has been granted a leave of absence for the winter and spring terms of next year. Professor Hole will spend the summer in geological work in Wisconsin, Colorado and the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, and during the winter and spring he will be in residence at the University of Chicago.

I ask thee not my joys to multiply,
Only to make me worthier of the least.

Correspondence.

Boston, Fifth month 19th, 1904.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Dear Friend: Reading the excellent suggestions of John William Graham in thy last paper, caused me to think how difficult it seems to be to get people to do as we suggest, or would direct. And I wondered if our ministers studied, as they might, the best ways to influence others to follow their teachings, in their ministry. And my mind went back many years to the ministry of a dear friend whom the Master highly honored, and who was an honor to her ministry (Elisabeth Mallison, of New York).

To influence people not to sin, she would hold up before them, as no one else I ever heard, the terrible heinousness of sin, making many word pictures of the sinner in his different experiences that seemed to stand out so clearly in the light that no one could fail to see something of his own experience in sinfulness, and the terrible degradation and loathsomeness of it, and causing everyone to feel sick of their condition, and a great desire to escape from the condition so clearly seen by themselves.

And then with equal or even stronger power she would portray Christ in the beauty and harmony of his character, and the joy and happiness of following him, the nobility and beauty of a Christian character, and the possibilities set before the Christian, until every one listening would long to be in such experience, and resolve with tremendous earnestness to begin then; or, if they had already begun, would renew their resolution to live up to the great and high privilege so freely provided and so lovingly invited to enjoy by the Master.

I would greatly rejoice if more of the ministry of the present day was devoted to making people better acquainted with Christ and his love, and the rich enjoyment he has set before them, rather than the duties and requirements of the church. It seems to me that the service most pleasing to our Heavenly Father is that prompted by love, rather than duty, and that no one whose heart is filled with that love, begotten by an acquaintance with Christ and daily intercourse and association with him, will wait for duty to prompt them to serve, but rather seek to be in his service in that way most pleasing to him.

OLNEY T. MEADER.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Fred E. Smith and wife, formerly from Farmland, Ind., now students from Earlham College, led in the morning service at Knightstown, Ind., the 22d ult. He took his text from Ephesians 6: 10, "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might."

President Robert L. Kelly, of Earlham College, has received no less than twenty invitations this season to deliver commencement and baccalaureate addresses, nearly all of which he has accepted. He speaks at the following Friends' academies: Bloomingdale Academy, Central Academy, Spiceland Academy, and Fairmount Academy, all in Indiana; and Raisin Valley Seminary, Adrian, Mich.

Marlboro Monthly Meeting was held the 21st ult., at Tillson, N. Y. There was an excellent attendance, the house being well filled. Walter H. Commons, who has recently located at Clintondale as pastor, was favored in delivering a message from the text, "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." At the business meeting there were fourteen new members received from Tillson.

Prof. Brown, of Union Theological Seminary, and wife, in company with George Adam Smith, of Edinburgh, recently made a short visit to the Friends' Mission at Ramallah, Palestine. They all expressed much appreciation of the work, and both men made short addresses to the girls and boys. They were especially pleased to know that the boys were receiving manual training, and Dr. Smith impressed the boys with the necessity of knowing how to do one thing well. In parting with the superintendent, Dr. Smith turned and said, "You are working along the right line." This means much, coming, as it does, from one who is thoroughly conversant with life and conditions in Palestine.

The school year of 1903-1904 at Friendsville Academy, Tenn., closed with appropriate exercises the 15th to 19th ult. Farnum Hall was filled to overflowing by happy groups anxious to witness the exercises. The enrollment and attendance have been the largest for many years. The prospect for the future opening perhaps never more encouraging. Five students complete the prescribed course of study, four of whom are girls from humble homes, who go out for service, and in time to prove themselves worthy of the labors of love and deeds of kindness bestowed upon them. Friendsville Academy, with a small endowment and gifts of recent date, is taking an important place with schools having much larger endowments. The school in the future will likely be in charge of native teachers.

We have from time to time given items in reference to the proposal of Ohio Yearly Meeting to start a college for the "safe Christian education of young men and women." The committee in charge of this concern is making definite progress. The Board of Western Reserve University has offered the yearly meeting's committee the college situated at Hudson, Ohio. It has a campus of twenty acres and nine buildings, with accommodations for one hundred boarders. This property is offered free of cost, on condition that Ohio Friends will maintain a college and a preparatory school there for a term of ten years. It will require about $35,000 to repair and equip the college property, and the committee in charge hopes to raise a guaranty fund of $10,000 a year for ten years.

The Friends' Meeting in Woonsocket, R. I., regrets that Emeline H. Tuttle, who came to that city to live near her sister, and who has made it her home for the last five years, is about to remove to Indianapolis, where her son, who graduates this year from Earlham, is to engage in business. Her service, not only as a preacher of the gospel and as a shepherd of the flock, but also as a sympathetic neighbor and helpful friend in all cases of need, has been of great value. Those who have listened to her preaching have felt uplifted and encouraged. Her ability to unite the interests of young and old has resulted in the large attendance of children at the meeting for worship. The young people, some of whom have sought her advice in their joys or their perplexities she leaves strengthened in character.

J. Carter and Tamar Bales, members of the University Monthly Meeting, Wichita, Kansas, have issued a souvenir pamphlet entitled, "An Hour with Frances, Our Junior," in memory of their daughter, who departed this life Eleventh month 22d, 1903. She was a very active worker in the Junior Christian Endeavor, and was much interested in missions. The souvenir contains a number of inspiring sketches from her life and service, which are helpful to all, but especially to younger Christians. The books are sold for fifteen cents each, and the proceeds are devoted to the mission at Douglas, Alaska, and to the F. A. I. M. The Junior Endeavorers at Friends' University have sold several of the books in the local meeting, but interested friends are desirous to extend its sale. This should be encouraged, since every sale is a double blessing, in that the book will help its readers and the price the mission cause. They can be secured from J. Carter Bales, Wichita, Kansas, R. F. D., No. 7.

Events and Comments.

Matthew Stanley Quay, senior Senator from Pennsylvania, died at his home in Beaver, Pa., on the afternoon of Fifth month 28th. Senator Quay is widely known as a political organizer. He was the chairman of the National Republican Central Committee in 1888, when Harrison was elected President. He has been a prominent figure in the United States Senate for several years.

The greatest military victory yet won by the Japanese was that of General Oku's forces in taking possession of Kinchan, and in capturing Nanshan Hill, the key to the entrance to the Kwantung Peninsula. The losses were heavy on both sides. The Russians were completely routed and driven back toward Port Arthur, which is now completely shut in. Kuroki's forces are slowly moving north, so that the Japanese are on the aggressive in all quarters.

The annual report of the London Peace Society deplores existing and recent wars, and calls attention to the Anglo-French agreements, the signing of arbitration treaties and seventeen particular instances of arbitration. The ob-

MAC'S LUCK.

The Young Woman Reporter's Story.

The following food tale written by a clever young newspaper woman is a true story that came under her personal observation:

"I have been with the ——— (a paper in a California town) for nine years, and Mac has been with us all that time, and I do not know how much longer. Mac's full name is MacClellan. Before the Linotypes came in he was a good printer, and was one of the first to learn the machine, and is now, at about the age of 42, one of our very fastest operators.

"Last winter and the winter before, Mac, probably from constant night work, and improper food, got badly run down, could not eat much, what little he did eat did not do him much good, and he always complained he could not keep warm.

"I missed him for a while, until yesterday I overtook him on the street, going toward the office, and hardly knew the man; had it not been for the familiar walk I should surely have passed without recognizing him. He was stout, his face was round and ruddy, and his eyes bright as I had never seen them before.

"I said, 'Mac, I hardly know you, what on earth have you been doing to get so fat?' He replied, 'Grape-Nuts, nothing else. I started in on Grape-Nuts food three months ago when I weighed 126 and was feeling miserable, but now I weigh 160 and feel better than I ever felt in my life. I quit my old diet and went on Grape-Nuts, and that's the whole story.'" Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Exercise is necessary, but there's no nourishment in it, and proper food alone can supply that. Grape-Nuts for ten days is a pleasant trial and proves big things.

There's a reason.

servance of Peace Sabbath was even more successful than on previous occasions, about 6,000 sermons having been delivered and 326,000 papers and pamphlets distributed in connection with it. The society's invitation was also addressed to 1,426 Protestant pastors in France. A large amount of other literature has been published by the society.

Secretary Hay, impelled by a desire to prevent a possible war between two friendly republics, has suggested to the Brazilian Government through Minister Thompson, at Petropolis, that the United States Government would be very much pleased if Brazil and Peru would confer in a spirit of mutual concession and settle the vexed Acre question between themselves, or, if that is not possible, then agree to submit the dispute to arbitration.

The reciprocity treaty appears to have had a favorable effect upon the commerce between the United States and the Gem of the Antilles. As compared with the first three months of 1903 the imports from Cuba for the first three months of 1904 have increased 95 per cent. and the exports to the island show a gain of 25 per cent. This increased commercial activity is attended with other favorable facts. Lawlessness has been put down to a great extent and "a feeling of absolute security prevails throughout the island."

The breach between the French Government and the Pope has been widened by recent events. One day last week, after an exciting debate, in which Premier Combes and Foreign Minister Delcasse set forth the action and purposes of the government toward the Vatican, the Chamber of Deputies by an overwhelming vote approved the course of the government in recalling M. Nisard, Ambassador to the Vatican, and rejected all propositions of the extreme element for an immediate dissolution of the relations between Church and State.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which met in Buffalo, N. Y., last week, by an overwhelming majority adopted resolutions favoring the reunion and union of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church on the following basis: The union shall be effected on the doctrinal basis of the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as revised in 1903, and of its other doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards; and the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments shall be acknowledged as the inspired word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

No more important decision has been rendered by the United States Supreme Court in a long time than the unanimous decision by that august body handed down on Fifth month 16th, in which it affirmed the decision of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, which had refused a writ of habeas corpus to Turner, the English Anarchist, John Turner, a lecturer on sociological subjects, who in England, his native country, is regarded as a dangerous Anarchist, came to the United States in Tenth month, 1903, and was allowed to land, but at the first meeting which he

BOTH JAWS SHOT AWAY.

Still a Successful Business Man.

A man who had both jaws shot away had trouble eating ordinary food, but found a food-drink that supplies the nutriment needed. He says:

"I have been an invalid since the siege of Vicksburg, in 1866, where I was wounded by a Minie ball passing through my head and causing the entire loss of my jaws. I was a drummer boy and at the time was leading a skirmish line, carrying a gun. Since that time I have been awarded the medal of honor from the Congress of the United States for gallantry on the field.

"The consequences of my wound were dyspepsia in its most aggravated form, and I finally proved ordinary coffee was very hard on my stomach, so I tried Postum and got better. Then I tried common coffee again and got worse. I did this several times, and finally as Postum helped me every time I continued to use it, and how often I think that if the Government had issued Postum to us in the army how much better it would have been for the soldier boys than coffee.

"Coffee constipates me and Postum does not; coffee makes me spit up my food, Postum does not; coffee keeps me awake nights, Postum does not. There is no doubt coffee is too much of a stimulant for most people, and is the cause of nearly all the constipation.

"This is my experience, and you are at liberty to use my name." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

little book, "The Road to Wellville."

To the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

California offers at the present time greater inducements to the man who is looking for a home where climate and the productiveness of the soil are equal, than any other State in the Union.

Having been for about three years associated in a business way with the real estate firm of C. M. Wooster Co., of San Francisco, Cal., I have been making a study of the advantages offered to home seekers.

Having had for some time an impression that a number of Friends who are now living in the Eastern States would, if a suitable location could be secured, found a Friends' Church in California, where at the present time there are no Friends, I have selected and secured several hundred acres of choice land in the Sacramento Valley, fifty miles north from Sacramento, the State capital. Here in this great valley is the home of alfalfa, which yields abundantly; the orange, which is ready for market six weeks earlier than in Southern California; the fig, prune, peach, apricot, apple and pear all thrive on this rich sediment soil.

Our object is to locate Friends on this land, build a new church and a new community, where there is an opportunity for doing good.

A number of Friends in California have made inspection of this land, and intend locating. Among them are O. N.
Kenworthy, San Jose, and B. F. Carey, Long Beach.

MOHONK ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

For ten years annual conferences have been held at Lake Mohonk, New York, to promote the peaceful settlement of all international disputes. At the first conference, ten years ago, the prophecies of a permanent tribunal for the nations seemed to many only a vague dream, a far-away hope. This year one of the judges of such a permanent tribunal presided over the conference. The review of the gains which have been made even during the past year gave every one who heard it a thrill of joy. We are inclined to be depressed over the sad conflict in the Far East, and to conclude hastily that the cause of arbitration has suffered a great defeat. Quite the contrary. No single year has ever been marked by greater advances toward ultimate and permanent peace. The boundary dispute between the United States and Canada has been peacefully settled. The Hague tribunal has successfully settled the difficult controversies between the greater and lesser powers, arising from the blockade of the ports of Venezuela. France and England, hereditary foes for a thousand years, have signed a treaty agreeing to refer their differences to The Hague Court. A number of other nations have taken the same steps toward peace.

Internally the signs of progress are no less remarkable. A group of our Congressmen have organized a branch of the interparliamentary peace union, already comprising forty-three Senators and Congressmen, and about to be enlarged to the number of one hundred. A great arbitration conference was held at the opening of the year in Washington; another is to occur during the summer at St. Louis, the latter being composed of representatives of the various parliaments of the world, for which our government has appropriated $50,000. Perhaps even more important is the fact that the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce in over thirty American cities have adopted resolutions in favor of international arbitration, and they are uniting in efforts to influence our President and our two houses of Congress toward favorable action in this direction.

The next great step to be sought will be the signing of a treaty between the United States and England for the settlement of all questions between these two countries. All possible influences will be brought to bear at Washington this winter to accomplish this end, and eventually to secure still other treaties with other nations as the way opens for it.

The conference this year rose surely to the high water mark. Probably no abler gathering has ever before assembled in this country for a similar purpose, and no wiser counsels have been listened to anywhere. It seemed at times as we listened to the inspiring and eloquent words as though the day for which prophets have prayed, and of which angels have sung, must be very near. But we must not be disappointed if setbacks occur, and if our visions are slow of realization. The transformation of human nature requires time and patience. It is enough to know that tremendous forces are now at work to make our best dreams some day real. Here follows, in part, the important platform of this tenth conference at Lake Mohonk:

With unabated confidence in the cause of international arbitration this conference renews its allegiance to the principles involved, and continues its efforts to promote them.

Each year marks distinct progress towards the attainment of the beneficent ends proposed. This progress has been along the lines of natural growth and development.

With great gratification we record the fact that eleven nations—five of them ranking among the great powers—have appeared before the Court at The Hague and submitted their controversies to its adjudication. This has been done in the same orderly and judicial manner as that which obtains in our ordinary courts of justice where disputes between individuals are decided. In either class of cases one party or the other is likely to be disappointed with the result, but it is accepted as the only rational and civilized substitute for a direct settlement between the parties themselves. We confidently rely upon the irresistible power of public opinion to give effectual sanction to the judgments of the arbitral tribunal and to extend the scope of its jurisdiction.

We rejoice that the increasing development of commercial communications between countries tends to the advancement of universal peace. This conference is more than ever conscious of the profoundly vital and important nature of the work in which it is co-operating.

In all parts of the land, in city and country, in family and store, and workshop, in church and school and State, in all relations of life attempted settlement by war leaves its sad and indelible work. We therefore appeal to all to co-operate in diffusing such a righteous sentiment and feeling towards all classes, conditions and races of men that international arbitration will be resorted to as the best means of securing international justice whenever diplomacy fails. To such a sentiment and feeling, when awakened, the law-making and treaty-making powers of the government will readily respond.

Several nations have already signified their readiness to enter into treaties with the United States, providing for the submission of their controversies to The Hague Tribunal. We urge upon the government not only to take early and favorable action in response to these suggestions, but also to take the initiative action in negotiating similar treaties with all nations, whereby they shall agree "to submit to arbitration by the permanent court at The Hague all differences which they may fail to adjust by diplomatic negotiations," and by which they shall further "agree not to resort in any case to hostile measures of any description till an effort has been made to settle any matter in dispute by submitting the same to The Hague Tribunal."

THE ARCH STREET CENTENNIAL.

THE commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the building of the Arch Street Meeting-house in Philadelphia is an event of great historic interest. With the exception of the ancient meeting-house at Newport, R. I., the house at Arch Street is the oldest building in which any yearly meeting in America now assembles. The very name of this house has come to stand for a certain type of Quakerism. Here have preached many of the most famous Friend ministers of the past century. Here have gathered many of the most distinguished persons who have given name and power to the Society during this great hundred years. In this house the crisis of two of the greatest controversies in our history was met, one ending in separation and the other in withdrawal from correspondence with all the other yearly meetings.

Here has met for a hundred years the "meeting for sufferings," which has been one of the foremost organizations in these United States in dealing with all forms of need and wrong, of reform and alleviation, of enlightenment and spiritual advancement. It gives one a sense of pride to review the noble record of this body, which year after year has watched the affairs of the world, solely bent upon the peaceful mission of relieving the woes of men and of making the circumference of truth and peace and righteousness wider. It is, too, worth much, in the rush and hurry of these days, when commercialism and sensationalism are too blatant, to have from year to year the calm and solid gatherings in this old Arch Street house proclaiming the message that the still small voice is after all the permanent power, and proving that in divine confidence and quietness is strength.

Many, in fact most, who read these words have been brought up under different types of Quakerism from the one which has been in evidence in this now famous meeting house; they know only by hearsay of its manners, its methods and its members. We are apt to misunderstand and misjudge anything until we have felt and discovered its real spirit and its purposes. It would surely be well for American Quakerism everywhere, if there lived in it and through it the same loyalty to principle, the same devotion to apprehended truth, the same spirit of sacrifice, the same love of that for which the fathers suffered, as characterize those who meet in the house now completing its first century.

AN OMINOUS LIQUOR BILL.

WE commented two weeks ago on the fact that one-fourth of all the members of the British Parliament are financially interested in the liquor business. This fact is serious enough at any time, but it is particularly serious now that far-reaching liquor legislation is under consideration by Parliament. The proposal is nothing less than a complete revision of the licensing methods. The English licensing code is more than four hundred years old, and every change which has been made in it during these centuries has been suggested by temperance reformers.

The present bill comes from the government, and is plainly in the interests of the brewers and license holders. By the provision of this new bill the power to withdraw a license from a saloonkeeper is taken from the local magistrates and put in the hands of the magistrates at quarter sessions. This means that the power over licenses is no longer to be local, but foreign to the community where the saloon does its business, as though the courts at Harrisburg should settle the saloon licenses in Philadelphia. But this loss of local control is not the most serious feature of the bill. The bill appears to establish a permanent monopoly. It makes a license a vested right. If the magistrates at the quarter sessions, these remote judges who are to have the power, ever do refuse to renew a license, the saloon-keeper can demand and secure compensation for his loss. The passage of the bill in its present form will fix the saloon so firmly upon English society that it will be harder to dislodge than it was to overthrow American slavery. At present the capitalized value of licenses in England is estimated to be about $1,500,000,000. Arthur Chamberlain, who speaks with authority, says that the passage of this government bill will double at once this enormous valuation of saloon property. It is being pushed ahead with astonishing defiance of public sentiment. It remains to be seen whether the temperance forces of that great civilized and Christian nation can mass power enough to defeat this attempt to fasten the drink evil upon its people in perpetuity. We, in America, can do nothing to help accomplish this defeat. But may we not learn something from the situation there? The real trouble in England appears to be that the friends of the liquor business are not afraid of the temperance forces. We are in danger of having the same thing happen here. In time of peace we must prepare for war. We must watch every move in the saloon business. We must study the whole situation and be ready at a moment's notice to make our power felt. There is plenty of hard fighting ahead.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.
THE THEOSCOPE.

BY H. W. WARREN.

We have the microscope for seeing fine, the telescope for seeing far, the spectroscope for seeing the dark lines of many material substances in the light, the stethoscope for perceiving, not by the eye, the internal state of the breast, and various other scopes for perceiving various things. But what we need most of all is a theoscope for seeing God.

This is a legitimate field for scientific research with suitable instruments. We need not wait till this muddy vesture of decay is taken off, as Job said in despair of present vindication, "Without my flesh shall I see God," for Moses but expressed a desire in accordance with human possibility when he said, "I beseech thee show me thy glory." History had told him that the Lord had appeared under various forms unto Adam, Abram, Isaac, Jacob and others. But Moses wanted to see the real essence. For that there must be waiting, but in the denial, God offered to make His goodness pass before him. And He did, to the great irradiating of His face. For such vision human eyes are adequate. Elisha knew that the organs for seeing spiritual existences existed and only needed unveiling when he said, "I pray thee open the eyes" of the young man. The Lord of all spiritual realms asserted the same fact when He said, "The pure in heart shall see God." This "shall" has an assertive or imperative, rather than a future force. This is a common significance. The verb optomai, from which this epsontai, ("shall see") comes, does not mean to see with eyes exclusively, but it means to perceive with the mind, to know, as Acts 8: 23: "I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity"; Col. 2: 18, seen with feeling of reverence (American Version note); John 3: 11 and 32, seen with spiritual organs; John 16: 16, "Ye shall see me spiritually present after my body has departed."

It also means to become acquainted with by experience: John 3: 36, not experience life; Luke 17: 22, not know by experience one of the days of the Son of man.

It also means to take heed to, to see to it. Matt. 27: 4, see to your betrayal of innocent blood yourself. Also, verse 24, see to it yourselves. Acts 18: 15, see to the effect of your own law.

In these senses, then, (a) to perceive with the mind, (b) to know by experience, (c) and then to reverently take heed to, man may see God.

What is the instrument, the theoscope?

Professor Agassiz once approached the instrument of a celebrated microscopist, but paused and said: "Tell me what I am to see." The microscopist, delighted, answered, "You are a man after my own heart. You recognize that there must be a prepared mind to enable the eye to see rightly." We shall see what we expect or desire to see. Thousands have eyes but see not the things that are visible to others. A cold critic, gazing on one of Turner's gorgeous pictures of sky in which God made the outgoing of the morning and evening rejoice, said, "I never see such colors in the sky as you paint." "Don't you wish you could?" said Turner. "I never can begin to paint what I see." To some

A primrose by the river's brim
A yellow primrose is to him,
And it is nothing more.

To another every common bush is aflame with God. So the first qualification is desire and expectancy. Then one is anxious to be taught, like Agassiz, by artists already qualified. How many of them there are! What a choice selection of the results of their seeing is recorded in the Bible.

The instrument of this theoscope is the heart. With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and this rightness is the purity in heart that enables one to perceive God. As the patriot thrills to see his country in the flag; the bride to see covenanted constancy of love in a ring; the Christian to see divine love even unto death in the cross, so the pure in heart have a theoscope to see God in everything that He has made.

How the Bible seers saw Him! The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth His handiwork. He bringeth the rain. He causeth the grass to grow. He giveth to the beast his food. How the hymns roll the rhythm of His presence in nature till the morning stars sing together and all the universe is one Æolian harp swept by the breath of God.

The harp at nature's advent strung
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars at morning sung
Has never died away.

How the world, human history, and one's individual experience are all glorified when God is perceived, even dimly, in them all.

The full revelation is not yet,

For if I could see, as in truth they be,
The glories that encircle me,
I should lightly hold this tissued fold
With its marvelous curtain of blue and gold.

The full revelation of God, when we awake in His likeness and see Him as He is, must be expected, desired and prepared for here. After our theoscope, which has been made by the best artist, has been used to perfection by an expectant soul till God is pavilioned in every splendor, breathed in every rose, and all nature sings His boundless love, then we may say:

In that sudden strange transition,
By a known but finer sense,
Shall we grasp the mighty vision,
And receive the influence.

THE NEW PALESTINE.

BY RUSSELL H. CONWELL.

I have seen His face! It was but a glimpse, but it was beautiful. Christ is coming back to Palestine. Many have thought that when they crowned Him here with thorns, and lifted Him up on Golgotha, He went away forever. But He is coming once more to His own land.

It is nearly twenty-eight years since I came first to this city and visited its sacred places. The impression left on me then was gloom in the extreme. Gethsemane and Calvary were fit emblems of the condition of the land of Abraham and David. Poverty, filth, ignorance, avarice, tyranny, robbery and murder characterized the every-day life of the people. Christ seemed so far, far away. The sweet spirit that makes woman so lovely, childhood so happy, men so strong and true, seemed never to visit their hovels nor make a suggestion to their rulers. Leprosy of body, and equally incurable leprosy of mind, infected every place and tainted every soul. The land was densely, cruelly heathen. The real Christ was far away over the sea. He seemed busy there at delightful firesides, in happy schools, and in crowded churches. But He is certainly drawing near once more to the city He once loved. Changes in customs, language, brotherly feeling, toleration, cleanliness, education, domestic life, churches, streets, business and happiness—all reveal His dear face.

What the impression may be upon those who have resided in Jerusalem for the past thirty years I do not know; but to me, returning after so long an absence, the changes seem most surprising. People laugh now. Children pipe and dance in the market-places now; women move about with freedom; men look happy and benevolent, and Christian institutions have almost surrounded the city with noble buildings. Thirty years ago the Christian sects fought to the death at the very portal of the Holy Sepulchre. Degradation, superstition and hate made Christians more heathen than the Mohammedans. But a new spirit breathes through it all to-day. The Christ life and spirit are not fully in possession yet. But the day is sure when the dawn gleams red in the East. I can see that the Holy One draws near.

When I first came to Palestine, long ago, there was no sail or oar on Galilee; but last week many busy boatmen contended enterprisingly to get the patronage of two friends and myself as we indicated our purpose to go fishing one early morning. As we dropped our lines into the clear blue of the ancient lake we could hear the shepherds singing and piping on the mountains; cows awoke the old echoes with their lowing; and children ran gleefully along the shore and splashed their bare feet in the wavelets on the beach. Thirty years ago all was silent on that shore. Men, when any were seen, seemed like ghosts. Laughter there was none. The whole region seemed under the curse. Capernaum's fields were uncultivated, and her ruins lay unmoved amid reeds, thistles and serpents.

But when our caravan from Damascus reached Capernaum, a few days ago, a charming Greek Christian welcomed us with smiles, and a clean civilized dinner in a home that was commodious and new. There were thirty-one pair of oxen in sight plowing up the rich soil, and the thistles and serpents were gone. A Christian civilization, which is the reflection of Christ's dear face, has already uncovered the ruins of the synagogue wherein Jesus preached on the bread of life, and the residence of Jesus at Capernaum may welcome Him yet again. Bethsaida was in bloom, and gardens cultivated when Peter and Andrew were there now bear fruit once more. In another score of years it is clear that fresh villages will hide the broken bricks and scars of the past. At Tiberias, where, on my previous visit, was squalor and vermin, disease and deformity most hideous and nauseating, I could still see great room for advance. But the clean uniform of the police, the new hotel, the great influence of the large English Christian hospital, two English schools, and the individual missionaries made the place habitable and the people hospitable.

Evidence of reform in many ways was strikingly apparent, and when a bright, neatly-dressed boy accosted me in English, and kindly escorted me through the crooked streets, I could not realize that this could be the den of beggars and dogs which I visited in 1870. Then to go into the valley of Arbela or on the Mount of Beatitudes alone was dangerous, and at all times uncomfortable. Now no robbers infest Arbela's caves, and a carriage road from Haifa on the Mediterranean to Tiberias on Galilee passes along the foot of the Mount of Beatitudes. Travel is as safe as in Massachusetts, and travelers are more courteous and accommodating.

The shepherds sang us a native song as we waited for the devout brethren who had ascended the mount to hold a prayer-meeting. "Blue Galilee, where Jesus loved so much to be," is not a dark spot hidden away in the bleak mountains, the abode of banditti and storks. It is a frequented lake, and the new hotel at the hot springs on the shore makes it quite like a summer resort. Ah, yes! Jesus is coming back to Galilee. At Nain we saw a clean hospice, built since I visited this land, and at Cana flocks of school children came out by the roadside and sang in chorus "Jesus loves me" as we rode by. The white-haired old saint who showed us the ancient water-pots at Cana replied to my question as to his health that he was "waiting for the coming of the Lord."

Bethlehem has changed greatly in the appearance of the people, in the integrity of its business, and in the reappearance of Ruth in many a modern emancipated woman. The churches have not changed so much; the manger and the shepherds' fields have not changed at all; but the eyes and movements of the people speak of intelligence and kindness which seemed unknown years ago. It was clear to me that He is coming back to the place of His birth. At Bethany there has been no change but the opening up of a garden at the home of Mary and Martha, showing clearly that the home Jesus loved so much to visit was even luxuriously decorated and furnished. At Jericho there have been built two hotels, and Elisha's spring runs a new grist mill. The Jordan rolls on to the unfathomable Dead Sea as of old, and pilgrims crowd its banks at Easter season as of yore. But no man falls among thieves now in the Cherith Brook's awful gorge, and a macadamized wide road makes it an easy ride now, in a coupé or landau, from Jerusalem to the Jordan.

When I was here before the party to which I was attached was "held up" by the Bedouin, and robbed of their watches, while, two nights later, one was shot through the shoulder while descending the Mount of Temptation. Now it is as safe, they say, in the wilderness of Judea as in New Jersey. There are less soldiers, and no change in the form of government. But a new spirit is in the land. All creeds, races and classes feel it. It is the near coming of the Prince of Peace. The land is wretched still, but peace, goodwill, hospitality to other nations and beliefs have come to stay. Soon existing evils will go, and then Christ's spirit will at once flood the land.

But the most gratifying evidence of a Christian grace fresh given is seen here in the city, in the kindly toleration and the recognition of the claims of human brotherhood. I no longer see a Christian mocking at a Mohammedan, nor have I heard a word of angry hate for the Christian from a Mohammedan. Years ago fanaticism and prejudice ran into business, and was the continual cause of scimmages on the streets. Jew and Gentile were in constant contention, and we dared not visit the Christian quarter of the city with a Mohammedan conductor. No sign of that prejudice appears. I saw a Mohammedan reading a German book on electricity to a company of Arabian spectators, to the evident gratification of all parties. The Jews, although forbidden by the unchanged law of Turkey, are coming back in thousands. Colonies of Jews from Russia, Germany and Italy are springing up—thrifty, clean, enterprising and honest—which influence all the country about them.

Dr. Selah Merrill, the United States Consul at Jerusalem, and one of God's most useful and noble men, told me that within ten years the influence of the construction of so many hospitals, homes, and churches about Jerusalem had led the Moslems to clean up their mosques and repair their sacred buildings, so as to make almost a revolution. When I was there before, almost every kind of filth and stench met us in all the corridors of Solomon's and Herod's temple, now the Mosque of Omar Square. But to-day it is swept and washed with a scrupulous cleanliness. The names of the places and the titles of the sects have not changed, but the spirit of the worship and the motives of the people have turned Christward surprisingly.

The Christian missionary has cut down the hills and raised the valleys, and made straight the way of the Lord. He has not taught in vain, though the adherents of his personal creed may be numbered on his fingers. But the Christian life, self-sacrifice, manner, love, and fidelity to duty throw a slow but powerfully sure leaven into the masses, the influence of which is patent indeed to the visitor who has been long absent. It is perhaps more clear to the observer at Jaffa, with its new colonies; at Beyrout, with its wonderful American College; and at Constantinople, where the Robert College is so respected by all classes. But Jerusalem has steadily bowed to the teachings of the disciples of Jesus, until it seems almost ready to kneel at His feet. One of these days there will be a sweeping revolution in name and profession, and the Lord will seem to come suddenly to His temple. But it will be but the opening of a book already written. He is looking from Olivet on the city now. I do not think He is weeping there, for His triumphal entry this time leads to no Golgotha.—"S. S. Times," Fifth month, 1898.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

"OPPORTUNITY AND RESPONSIBILITY."

BY S. B. WOODARD.

Some one has said that "God owes no one anything but an opportunity," and this is, or has been, given to everyone. Paul, in his letter to the Galatians, says, "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good to all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." First, he says, plainly, we have the opportunity to do good, and, second, having it, we should use it. He also declares "that we should not grow weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." The reciprocal relation between the teacher and the taught is beautifully portrayed in the language of the apostle in the same connection. "Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things." The law of reciprocity does not seem to be understood or appreciated. "Give and it shall be given you." "Water others and you shall be watered."

John J. Ingalls taught that "the great opportunities of temporal success are the central magnets about which other great opportunities are apt to revolve. So every great spiritual opportunity, if rightly improved, will be the forerunner of others." God, from one opportunity of Christian usefulness, rightly served, will lead on to another. On the other hand, opportunities for doing good once gone are gone forever. Others may arise, but never those that are past. The Old Romans used to believe that opportunity had wings on her feet, and that she could fly swifter than the winds.

Embracing opportunities for Christian service implies sacrifice. It may be directly contrary to our planning. "Man proposes, but God disposes." Man plans, but he must learn to replan before he can conform to the plans of the Infinite. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. "All are called, but few are chosen," because so few are willing to comply with the terms. So few are like Richard Fuller. Although the pride of the bar and of the State and city in which he lived, when he was converted, he turned away from political honor and preferment and declared that he would consecrate the remainder of his life to the gospel ministry. He says: "Suddenly my eyes were opened to see God's great love in sending Jesus Christ to earth to win my love, and this act so impressed me that I could do nothing else, as a man of honor, but to love Him in return."

Is it not a fact that most, if not all, the failures in the Christian life can be traced directly to a lack of spiritual preparation? We miss the opportunity because we are not willing by prayer and earnest application to gain the wisdom necessary for reward. Thomas A. Edison declares that he never made any great invention without first subjecting his brain to the hardest kind of mental toil. He says further that "When I have fully decided that a result is worth getting, I go ahead on it and make trial after trial, until it comes." Let the Christian believer do the same thing on the lines of faith in God, and wonderful results will follow.

The practical means of applying these principles are immanent. We as parents have the opportunity of reading and teaching the Bible in our families with our children. It is a positive command of God, and no one can disregard it without an irreparable loss. Then the opportunity is open for the public study of the Word by the parents leading the children to the Bible School and making all the preparation and equipments there as helpful and inspiring as possible. Although we may not be losing, but possibly gaining, ground in these particulars, yet I am impressed that there are many parents and heads of families who have not awakened to see the wonderful importance of making use of these God-given opportunities, and the remorse that is sure to follow the neglect of embracing them. If we were all prepared and ready cheerfully to meet these opportunities of doing good, do we suppose there would be any difficulty in getting good superintendents, qualified teachers and gifted, wide-awake committees to run the Bible School and make it what it should be, a recruiting auxiliary to the Church of Jesus Christ?

The opportunities of being a good neighbor are just as great to-day as when the Good Samaritan found the wounded Jew and administered the soothing cordial to his bruised and bleeding body. He simply embraced the opportunity that came in the pathway of life of doing good to a fellow pilgrim and of receiving the reward which had been lost by two others who were traveling the same road.

Sometimes our opportunities of doing good depend on our willingness to act upon the advice of our friends, especially those who are older and wiser by experience than we are. Queen Esther, by divine appointment, was instrumental in saving a nation, but it looks very much as if she would have failed if she had not heeded the good counsel of Mordecai. Moses, although a divinely-called and highly-favored leader, found it of great benefit to him and the thousands in Israel to accept the advice of Jethro, his father-in-law. The truth is, we are largely dependent upon others to help us into the enclosure, for the door has already been opened. "Behold I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it."

Opportunity means so much to young people that they should certainly be very careful how they decline or neglect the chances for Christian usefulness which God is ready to give to all His children, especially to them who love and obey Him. How often we have seen young men and young women with bright talents, trained in our schools and colleges for usefulness, when the Church or the Bible School opens the way and calls upon them for service, decline to embrace it, thus closing up the way that leads to blessing both to themselves and the Church.

Now a word on our responsibility. Responsibility follows opportunity. "He that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." If I have the opportunity of reading my Bible both at home and in the Sabbath School, and teaching the Word diligently to my children, and I neglect it all or any part of it, am I not responsible for the consequences of my neglect? To my mind one of the saddest failures in life recorded in the Bible for both our instruction and warning is that given of Eli, the priest, who we are told knew better, and had the opportunity to restrain his sons, and did it not, and not only Eli and his family, but the whole nation, suffered for his sin and neglect, a just recompense of reward. It has been repeated that Daniel Webster once said, in answer to a question propounded by his friends, that the greatest thought that had ever impressed his mind was his personal responsibility unto God. "I am among you as one that serveth," were the words of Jesus. "Therefore, as we have opportunity let us do good to all men."

LESSON XII.

SIXTH MONTH 19, 1904.

CHRIST RISEN.

Matthew 28: 1-15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Now is Christ risen from the dead.—1 Cor. 15: 20.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 13.—Christ risen. Matt. 28: 1-15.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 14.—Luke's account. Luke 24: 1-12.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 15.—The empty sepulchre. John 20: 1-20.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 16.—Resurrection predicted. Luke 9: 18-22.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 17.—The crucifixion. Mark 15: 25-39.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 18.—The sealed tomb. Matt. 27: 62-66.

First-day, Sixth mo. 19.—Power over death. John 10: 11-18.

Time.—Christ rose early on "the first day of the week" (according to our reckoning, Fourth month 9th), and the Ascension was forty days thereafter.

Place.—From the tomb, which was in a garden, not far from the hill Calvary. The ascension was from the Mount of Olives, not far from the village of Bethany (Luke 24: 50).

Parallel Accounts.—Mark 16: 1-11; Luke 23: 56 to 24: 12; John 20: 1-18.

All four of the evangelists give accounts of the Resurrection, but there are a number of differences in these accounts, some of which are rather hard to explain. It may be observed, however, that no one of them is inconsistent with the other accounts—there are no contradictions, and on all essential points they absolutely agree. It should be remembered that no one of the evangelists professes to give a complete narrative. The fact of the Resurrection is attested by evidence which is of the strongest kind. "Upon the fact of the Resurrection rests the supernatural origin and divine authority of Christianity." "If Christ be not raised your faith is in vain." 1 Cor. 15: 17.

1. "Now late on the Sabbath day, as it began to dawn," etc. The time was probably between night and sunrise. Jno. 20: 1. "Mary Magdalene." That is, Mary of Magdala. See Luke 8: 2. It is unfortunate that through tradition she has come to be regarded as having been an evil woman. There is no evidence in the Bible to make such a conclusion even probable. "The other Mary." The mother of James the Less and Joses. Matthew 27: 56. There was also present Salome, Joanna and other women. Luke 24: 10. "To see." To visit the place and look at the tomb.

2. The earthquake seems to have been before the women reached the place. The word literally means a great commotion. It was in all probability a local disturbance. "An angel." R. V. "Rolled away." The stone was not removed by the earthquake. John says there were two angels in the tomb (20: 12).

3. An attempt to convey in language the appearance of the heavenly visitants.

4. "The keepers." The Roman guards who were set to watch the tomb lest Christ's disciples should steal the body.

5. "Answered." To their fright and perplexity. "Ye" is emphatic. He knew what had brought these devoted women there at this early hour, and wished to reassure them.

6. "As he said." Matt. 16: 21; 17: 23. "Come, see the place." That they might see with their own eyes the empty tomb. "The Lord." Not "your" Lord, but "the" Lord.

7. Quickly, that they need not be sorrowful any longer. "His disciples." Mark says, "And Peter." "He goeth before you." This does not necessarily imply that He would literally travel thither. "Galilee." Where almost all of the disciples belonged. "There shall ye see him." Compare Matt. 26: 32.

8. "With fear and great joy." "Fear at the sight, joy at the word."

9. "As—disciples." These words are omitted in the best manuscripts. The account differs from that in John, who mentions only Mary Magdalene. It is difficult to make a harmony of the two narratives. As was said above, no account is a complete one, and in one narrative something may be told which is omitted in another.

10. "My brethren." First so-called in this place. The message was given to a woman showing the position in which Christ held woman.

11-15. This account is peculiar to Matthew.

11, 12. "While they were going" to the disciples. "Assembled with the elders." Probably not a formal meeting of the Sanhedrim. "Gave large money." As a bribe to make a false report.

13. "His disciples came by night and stole him away." The absurdity of this is shown on its face, for, if they slept, how could they know who took the body? Sleeping also was for a sentinel a crime punishable by death.

14. "If this come to the governor's ears," etc. This may mean by bribes or possibly by threats of reporting to the Roman government Pilate's wicked deeds, of which he committed many. The paragraph probably refers to an official examination. Pilate probably would pay no attention to a rumor, or even to private information.

15. "Until this day." That is, the time when the gospel was written. The exact date of the original gospel of Matthew is not known; perhaps about A.D. 40, and in its present form about 60 A.D.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The resurrection of Christ is the corner-stone of the evidence of His divinity.

2. The resurrection of Jesus Christ is one of the best-attested facts in history.

3. "Not she with trait'rous kiss her Saviour stung;
Not she denied him with unholy tongue;
She, while apostles shrank, could danger brave,
Last at His cross and earliest at his grave."

TOPIC FOR SIXTH MONTH NINETEENTH.

WHAT PAUL TEACHES ME ABOUT RISING ABOVE DISCOURAGEMENT.

2 Cor. 4: 7-18.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 13.—As Caleb did. Num. 13: 25-33.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 14.—As Moses did. Num. 32: 6-19.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 15.—As Christ does. Isa. 42: 1-4.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 16.—As David did. Ps. 42: 1-11.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 17.—As Peter and John did. Acts 4: 1-10.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 18.—As Paul did. Acts 27: 21-26.

When our forefathers used the spelling, "corage," they suggested somewhat more clearly the root idea of the word; but a little time with our etymology will bring us to the conclusion that when we speak of a person as discouraged we literally mean one without heart. How useless, then, is the hopeless one, for life means ability, and the discouraged are disabled; they have lost their powers.

Paul's shipmates were without heart, and it was only when he had inspired with something of his dauntless heartiness that these scores of human beings took up again the scepter of dominion that God gave at creation. Conflict and conquest belong to the original and final program for our earthly term of existence, and we will assuredly have no conquest nor receive any crown as overcomers while courage is wanting.

Paul's discourse to the Corinthians, which we are considering, hinges on the same single fact as did his address to the sailors in the storm, and that point is his declared foundation, "I believe God." Every other ground will be found insufficient some time. In slight stress a slight stay suffices, but in the final test only one will meet our needs.

But the abundance of that one support! Paul's exultant confidence breaks out again and again, because he is assured that "all things work together for good" to him, and that future glory will incomparably outweigh present tribulation. No room for discouragement in such a life.

The poet tells us that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." It is doubtless well that his words are so nearly true; yet a hope needs a basis; deferred hopes beget hopelessness from a merely human standpoint; but the "due season" of reaping can never fade from the thought of those who remember that their Master loves "unto the end."

Take up the leading thought for each character named in our daily readings, and add Joshua, reading from Joshua 1, and from his farewell address.

How many minutes would a spell of "blues" last while we were repeating Isa. 41: 10? Or communing with David's God in Ps. 103?

AMERICAN FRIENDS' MISSION WORK.

The statistical report for the last year was prepared and published as usual last fall. This shows 84 missionaries in the missions of American Friends, against 78 the year before; 193 native helpers, against 153; $63,927 passing into the mission treasuries of American Friends, against $58,268 of the previous year. There are 1,716 children under instruction in mission schools, 3,081 in the Sabbath Schools, 2,120 native members of Friends' Church, and a much larger number of believers that attend services or otherwise show their interest in Christianity. Though the gains over the last preceding year are not remarkable, they show healthy growth.

An opportunity occurred last summer to buy a lot with house upon it, that lay along side the Gibara Church property and adjoining also the grounds of the mission residence. It seemed very desirable from its situation for the mission to own and control this property, and the house, with a few changes and repairs, would make a suitable school house for present use, thus saving the rent of a building for that purpose. The money required to purchase the lot and put the house in order, about $700, was mostly contributed through private subscriptions. It saved rent of about $20 a month. The Board had but to begin to enjoy this relief to its treasury when the property occupied by the mission at Holguin was sold, and no suitable house could be secured without paying rent nearly double what had before been paid. A building of its own is a great need of this station now.

Sylvester and May M. Jones have continued in charge of the Gibara station. Emma Phillips taught the school till the close of last school year, 1903, and Clotilda L. Pretlow has taught it this year. All the school teachers, besides their work as teachers, are faithful missionaries. J. F. Galvez has assisted at Gibara fully half of the year. The Gibara Monthly Meeting has now 32 members, and there are 18 in the candidates' class, some of them ready for membership. The Sabbath morning meetings average 35 in attendance, and are times of great spiritual blessing. The evening meetings are usually about twice as large. The Sabbath School averages about 50; the superintendent and two of the teachers are natives. The Christian Endeavor Society has a membership of 39; average attendance, 25.

Meetings have been held at Pueblo Nuevo each Fourth-day evening, and the Sabbath School each Sabbath afternoon. There is one native teacher in the Sabbath School. One conversion is recently reported from the work there. At another outpost of Gibara a Sabbath School of about 30 is kept up, with a native superintendent and a native teacher.

About six miles out from Gibara and across the bay is the village of Potrerillo, where the Bible was not known and the gospel had not been preached. Last Twelfth month members of the Gibara C. E. Society, with Sylvester Jones as leader, visited the place and held a meeting, and were invited to return. The Christian Endeavor Society rented a room at their own expense, which they cleaned up, whitewashed, and arranged for their meetings. They have kept up the work there regularly since then, and the Lord's blessing has rested upon it. The work has outgrown the little room they began with, and the Gibara Monthly Meeting, with such outside help as is offered, has decided to build a chapel for them.

Charles and Orpha Haworth and Santos Trevino have continued to carry forward the work at Holguin. All have labored diligently, when health permitted, and their work has been successful. There are 32 in the class of candidates for church membership, and 14 who give evidence of conversion. The average attendance at regular preaching services is 83.

The mission at Banes, just opening when we made our last year's report, has been under the charge of R. S. Holding and wife, assisted part of the time by Arthur E. L. Pain and J. F. Galvez. These have all worked diligently, earnestly and even enthusiastically in Banes and in villages and colonies round about, which they have been able to reach on foot or on the cane and banana cars of the United Fruit Company, and some of all classes have responded to their presentation of truth.

About forty miles overland westward from Gibara is Puerto Padre, an old port of Cuba, but recently taking on new life and business activity. There Wilmington Yearly Meeting has opened a mission, which it manages and supports, though joined with Friends' other work in Cuba under the general superintendency of the American Friends' Board. The mission opened very propitiously last Tenth month.

Two missionaries were sent to the field last winter, consecrated young women knowing a divine call into the work. One, Edith Eva Terrell, of Wilmington Yearly Meeting, has joined the missionaries at Puerto Padre; the other, Mary Louisa Ellis, of Iowa Yearly Meeting, is now at Holguin, studying Spanish, to be a teacher. More missionaries are needed, strong physically, mentally and spiritually, called to the work and prepared or preparing themselves for it with a knowledge of Spanish.

The Board desires again to call the attention of the yearly meetings to its position as a Board of the Five Years Meeting, and the provision made by that meeting, in harmony with the Uniform Discipline, for funds for its work. We present to you a work in Cuba, our neighbor fallen among thieves who have robbed her of the Bible and of hope of Christ, a work in which a goodly number of souls are being saved, at which all our hearts must rejoice. But, should it be an orphan work left without responsible providers, without assured resources? Or, will the yearly meetings in some way guarantee some certain amount on which it may count, to be supplemented more or less by voluntary gifts and offerings it may receive?

All contributions for the work of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions should be sent to its treasurer, James Cary, Jr., No. 119 South Fremont Street, Baltimore, Md.

Educational.

COMMENCEMENT AT GUILFORD COLLEGE.

The most eventful year in the history of Guilford College closed on the 31st ult. The attendance was the largest ever recorded, 231, and the success of the year's operations was indicated in some measure by the satisfactory exercises which marked commencement week.

Two or three features may be mentioned. On the evening of the 29th Professor W. L. Poteat, of Wakeforest College, gave a scholarly and most helpful address on "Science—Its Relation to Life and to Faith," in which he defined the term science at some length, and then showed the benefits derived from scientific knowledge in a material way. Then, with this splendid setting, he pointed out in clearest possible terms how our faith, from our wide knowledge, is strengthened, or may be, and our whole religious life thus made more effective and more attractive.

On the evening of the 30th Samuel Hill gave an address to the Alumni Association on "Transportation." There was a large attendance, and the occasion was in every way a pleasant and profitable one. On the following day the exercises consisted of two orations by members of the graduating class, Ernest P. Dixon, who spoke on "Patriotism in a Democracy," and Elizabeth B. Bradshaw, who read a paper on "The True Benefactor," and the baccalaureate address by Samuel Hill. This address was a carefully-prepared paper on "Distinguishing Characteristics of a Quaker Education." The speaker preceded his paper, which was addressed to the graduating class, by a most interesting extemporaneous speech on the "Industrial Conditions of the South." Then, turning to the class, he gave a clear analysis of the doctrines Friends have held, and outlined the chief features of their educational work. He referred to Pliny Earle Chase as the greatest philosopher which the Society of Friends has ever produced, and mentioned his summing up all forms of philosophy into three: as that which both begins and ends within, the subjective-subjective; that which begins within and ends without, the subjective-objective, and that which begins without and ends within, the objective-subjective. The address was in every way a most admirable one, and is worthy of careful study.

The bachelor's degree was conferred upon Lyndon Lea White, Marvin Hardin, Joseph Dundas Cox, Robert P. Dicks, Charles G. Gainey, William P. Henley, David Ralph Parker, Katharine Crenshaw Ricks, Elizabeth B. Bradshaw, Ernest P. Dixon, Mary Alice Cartland.

Lyndon L. White, receiving the highest record for scholarship among the young men of the class, was awarded the Haverford College scholarship. Mary Alice Cartland, receiving the highest record in scholarship of the young women in the class, was awarded the Bryn Mawr College scholarship.

Reference was made by the president in his remarks to the large attendance during the year, the securing of subscriptions from the friends of the college to liquidate its indebtedness, the Harriet Green Memorial Fund and the great need of two new buildings, one for boys and one for girls, to the abundance of good water and the electric light plant; and the valuable donations of books and portraits received during the year, mentioning especially the portraits of Joseph John Gurney and George Fox, presented by Joshua L. Bailly, and the oil paintings of George and Martha Washington, presented by R. J. Mendenhall, of Minneapolis.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

The report of New York Yearly Meeting has not yet been received. It will be on hand for next issue.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Bridgeport, Ind., held the second meeting on the missionary work of Africa, the 29th ult. The program was well given and profitable to the cause.

The commencement exercises at Stella Friends' Academy, Oklahoma, took place the 27th ult., and were very satisfactory. Prof. E. E. Hadley gave the class address, which was highly appreciated.

Morton C. Pearson will soon close a very successful year's work with the Friends of Indianapolis Meeting. At a recent meeting of the Pastoral Committee he was invited to remain another year, with the assurance of the loyal support of the entire membership.

The meeting at Damascus, O., has enjoyed a very gracious season of revival. C. E. Cornell, of Cleveland, O., visited the meeting in Fourth month, and conducted a protracted effort for two weeks. About eighty persons claimed to be definitely blessed. At least half the number, mostly young people, were clearly converted.

The fifty-ninth year of Bloomingdale Academy, Ind., will close the 9th inst. with a graduating class of eleven. Elbert Russell, of Earlham College, gave the baccalaureate sermon on the 5th inst., and Robert L. Kelly will deliver the class address on the 9th. Andrew F. Mitchell will have charge of this Academy another year as principal.

David Hadley and wife have relinquished their pastoral work at Mooresville, Ind., and will move to Danville on account of her ill-health.

On First-day evening, the 22d ult., Prof. Elbert Russell, of Earlham College, gave a most interesting and instructive stereopticon lecture at Friends' Meeting House, Indianapolis, on "The Life and Ministry of Christ." All the pictures shown were copies of Tissot's paintings, a full set of which were presented to Earlham College recently by Indianapolis Friends.

Interesting and satisfactory services in commemoration of the establishment of The Hague Court were held at the Friends' Meeting House, Coloma, Ind. The regular meeting hour on Sabbath, the 29th ult., was occupied in that way. The discussion covered the whole question of peace and arbitration in brief, and was participated in by six members, who had previously been appointed for the task.

Friends of Indianapolis Meeting have decided to begin the erection of a modern ten-room residence on a lot adjoining the meeting house, to be used as a home for the pastor. The meeting is fully united in the proposition, and is pleased with the thought that henceforth the pastor will have commodious and convenient quarters in which to live. The building will be one of the most beautiful structures in that part of the city, and betokens a lively growth and interest in the work.

The Friends of Smithfield, Ohio, arranged for a roll-call service the 29th ult. Through a Correspondence Committee invitations were sent to all non-resident members, with a request for those who could not be present to send their testimony. Many responded. As the roll was called letters were read from members from five different States. Testimonies were given to the saving and keeping power of Jesus. A short history of the meeting was read, which was of much interest. The general feeling was that it was a time of much refreshing.

The following is taken from a letter of a Friend who visited New York Yearly Meeting, at Glens Falls, last week:

"I found New York Yearly Meeting to have the most life and the very best of unity prevailing, the best organized lines of work by far that I have seen in their yearly gatherings. And, furthermore, all seemed to be of good courage, so much so I expect to see a very marked advance made. The church did put on her beautiful garments and the name of the Lord was magnified."

The school year of the Christian Workers' Training School of Marshalltown, Iowa, closed the 24th ult. It was one of the most prosperous years of its history. The baccalaureate address was given by Ezra G. Pierson, of Bear Creek, Iowa. He emphasized the great opportunity in the commission of Christ and the necessary equipment for the world's evangelization. The commencement exercises were held in the Friends' Meeting House, Fourth-day evening, the 25th. Though raining the house was filled. Orations were delivered by the graduating class, which showed careful preparation. Prof. David M. Edwards, of Penn College, delivered the class address. His subject was "Success and Our Age." It was an earnest appeal for the thorough equipment of the whole man.

George N. Hartley and wife, L. Ella Hartley, from Tecumseh, Oklahoma, on their return from the late World's Sabbath School Convention at Jerusalem, stopped at Knightstown, Ind., and were present at the meeting the morning of the 29th ult. George Hartley gave a most eloquent discourse on the land of Palestine, now a place of desolation and degradation on account of the sinful rejection and crucifixion of Jesus Christ. Many places, like Capernaum, Bethsaida and Chorazin, now not to be found, are striking proofs of the sad condition of the country, many of the inhabitants living in mud houses in company with donkeys, goats and dogs, amid filth, dirt and disease, were vividly described. The visitors stopped in our city two days with Dr. T. R. Woodard, whose wife is a sister of L. Ella Hartley.

Newberg Quarterly Meeting was held at Newberg, Oregon, the 13th to 15th ult. A. W. Mendenhall and wife, also H. E. Pemberton, all recently from Iowa, and Charles Baldwin, from Salem Quarterly Meeting, were acceptably in attendance. A funeral service took the place of the usual devotional meeting on Seventh-day morning. The business session in the afternoon was a very long one, it being the last quarterly meeting before yearly meeting. Some of the reports were very encouraging. The evangelistic services conducted by Amos Kenworthy, also by Oliver Kenworthy, at both Springbrook and Portland, deserve especial mention, as they were productive of much good. One of the meetings gave a most encouraging report in regard to family worship, being so universally observed by its membership. In the quarterly meeting of Ministry and Oversight the initiative was taken for recording Phebe Hammer as a minister. Aaron Bray, of Portland, was appointed to his eleventh year of service as clerk of the quarterly meeting.

Virginia Half-Year's Meeting was held at Black Creek, Southampton County, on the 21st, 22d and 23d ult. Besides the local ministers, Samuel R. Neave and Lindley D. Clark, of Baltimore Quarterly Meeting, were in attendance. Florence I. Smith, of Baltimore, was also present. It was thought that about one thousand people were in attendance on First-day, and nearly as many on Second-day. Meetings were held on First-day morning, both in the house and in the grove adjoining. Also on Second-day morning and afternoon. The ministry was felt to be acceptable and helpful, a good interest being shown and some definite results indicated. On First-day afternoon as many as possible crowded the house to hear an address on "Opposing Forces," a vigorous and convincing discourse on temperance, by Dr. Guy, pastor of a Baptist church in the vicinity. At the business meeting the date of Half-Year's Meeting was changed from Second- to Seventh-day for the sessions in Fifth month of each year. The meeting house has been remodeled somewhat, and was thought to be quite improved by the changes.

Iowa Monthly Meeting (Shawnee Quarterly Meeting), Oklahoma, held at Union School House, the 7th ult., decided to hold the monthly meeting at the following places, the first Seventh-day in each month: Iowa Mission, First and Seventh months; Riverview, Second and Eighth; Valley Queen, Third and Ninth; Union, Fourth and Tenth; Agra, Fifth and Eleventh; Columbia, Sixth and Twelfth, with a two-days' session each time. The meeting at Union School House lasted two weeks. There were 75 conversions and 34 applications for membership. The meeting was conducted by home workers, with but little preaching. There had been much good seed sown the last few years by such ministers as Oliver Beeson, Marion Reisinger, Estella Hammond and others. Elijah D. Bradfield, a pioneer member, who has labored here faithfully for the last twelve years, attended every session. This is one of the busiest seasons of the year, yet the house was crowded every night. Anyone wishing to visit this monthly meeting should write to Albert Benson, correspondent, Agra, Oklahoma. The next session of Shawnee Quarterly Meeting will be held Sixth month 17th to 19th, at Valley Queen, near Tryon, Oklahoma, on the M. K. & T.

The program of commencement week at Penn College is as follows:

Fifth-day, Sixth month 9th.—8.00 p.m., public exercises of the Euphemian Society.

Sixth-day, Sixth month 10th.—8.00 p.m., public exercises of the Argonaut Society.

Second-day, Sixth month 13th.—3.00 p.m., address to graduating class of Academy, A. Cato Kaye, pastor Congregational Church, Oskaloosa. 8.00 p.m., Handel's "Messiah" (at the Opera House).

Third-day, Sixth month 14th.—4.00 p.m., business meeting of Alumni Association. 8.00 p.m., alumni oration, by Charles A. Kent, Class '95.

Fourth-day, Sixth month 15th.—10.00 a.m., commencement. Address by Mathew S. Hughes, pastor First Methodist Episcopal Church, Kansas City.

DIED.

HOCKETT.—At Westboro, Ohio, Fifth month 5th, 1904, Sarah Newby, wife of Thomas Hockett, in the 84th year of her age. She was a birthright member of Friends, and in her earlier life for some years an overseer in West Fork Monthly Meeting.

McKINLEY.—At Traverse City, Mich., Fifth month 20th, 1904, Esther D., wife of Henry McKinley, who is pastor in Traverse City Meeting, aged about 36 years. She was a true Christian and devoted wife. Having the impression that she would not live long she made all preparations for the end, and died leaving a beautiful testimony that all was well. Her infant child was buried with her.

Events and Comments.

Secretary Cortelyou is to be chairman of the Republican National Committee, if the wishes of President Roosevelt prevail, as they undoubtedly will.

The negro teachers of the country propose to meet at Nashville, Tenn., Eighth month 10th to 12th, to form a permanent organization to further the interest of negro education.

The Anglo-French Convention bill unanimously passed its second reading in the House of Commons last week. The bill provides for the assent of Parliament to the indemnities and cessions of territory under the recent Anglo-French agreement.

It is now practically settled that the gold standard will be adopted in Panama, and the Colombian silver now in use will be exchanged at 110 per cent. To prevent fluctuations in the value of the new silver coins the government will guarantee their face value by making a deposit of gold to their full value.

Another American citizen has been kidnapped—this time by bandits in Morocco. They have asked tribute, but it has been refused. Prompt action was taken by the State Department, and with the co-operation of France the situation is becoming hopeful. The latest report is the Turkish government will act, and that TURN OVER TIME.

When Nature Hints About the Food.

When there's no relish to any food and all that one eats doesn't seem to do any good, then is the time to make a turn over in the diet, for that's nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the kind required.

"For a number of years I followed railroad work, much of it being office work of a trying nature. Meal times were our busiest, and eating too much and too quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants, these together with the sedentary habits were not long in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

"There was little relish in any food, and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the poorer I got and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten.

"Then I commenced a fair trial of Grape-Nuts, and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong and with satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness or distress as before.

"I have been following this diet now for several months, and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Grape-Nuts with complete satisfaction, and much improvement in health and brain power.

"American people undoubtedly eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion, and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated in nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

the matter will be in a fair way toward settlement by the end of this week.

By a vote of 178 to 9, the United Presbyterian General Assembly, which met at Greenville, Pa., last week, adopted, with slight changes, the basis of union proposed by the Associated Reformed Presbyterian Church of the South. This is the second action toward union among Presbyterians which has taken place in General Assemblies within a month.

The Royal British Commission appointed in 1901 to inquire into the relation between human and animal tuberculosis finds that human and bovine tuberculosis are practically identical. The commission reports that experiments proved that the disease produced in animals by tuberculosis material, whether of human or of bovine origin, was identical both in its broad general features and in the finer histological details.

It has been announced on the authority of the Chinese Minister, Chentung Liang Cheng, that the Empire of China had at last become a signatory to the Geneva Convention. This convention involves a common agreement as to the rules of civilized warfare, and rendering possible co-operation in the care of the wounded. It is also said that in furtherance of this idea a Red Cross Society had been formed in China under the auspices of the Empress Dowager, who had started it with a personal subscription of 100,000 taels.

An interesting experiment is to be tried in Philadelphia, as it is being tried in some English and Scotch cities—the employment of auto-omnibuses for street transit in competition with electric railways. A company is already being organized, and will begin operations in Seventh month on a tentative scale. Two automobile cars will first be put into service on a short suburban route already served by both steam and electric roads, and they will be run on a regular half-hour schedule, the fare being five cents. If it proves a financial success the service will be extended.

The post office department has done much to protect the public against fraudulent schemes in the suppression of lotteries and other get-rich-quick projects. It now proposes to enforce the law in the suppression of certain patent medicines. Just last week Postmaster General Payne gave out a declaration regarding the attitude of the Department toward worthless nostrums and the newspaper publication of objectionable advertisements. It was explained that there was no intention of entering on a crusade against patent medicines or of establishing a censorship upon advertisements printed in newspapers, but simply aimed to correct abuses in cases of impropriety and fraud as required by law.

The Philadelphia "Public Ledger" points out that the Japanese operations in Korea and Manchuria this year have followed with surprising fidelity the plan of those conducted against the Chinese ten years ago. The same landing places have been used, the same roads followed, the same positions, formations and moving tactics employed. Thus far this military policy has prevailed against the Russians, as it did against the Chinese; not, indeed, so easily. Nevertheless, though at a cost of life immeasurably greater, the plans of Japan's armies have been successfully prosecuted. We come now to the moment when the tactics which ten years ago took Chinese Port Arthur are to be set in operation against that stronghold defended by a Caucasian garrison.

NOTICE.

The Disciplines for Kansas Yearly Meeting were shipped from Philadelphia, Pa., on the 28th of May. They are coming by freight to Kansas City, and will be reshipped from there by express. Unless there is some unforeseen delay, they will reach the different quarterly meetings in the course of the next three weeks.

MAGAZINES.

The issue of "The Outlook," dated June 4th is its Fifteenth Annual Illustrated Recreation Number. As is the custom of "The Outlook," this issue in addition to the usual editorial and interpretative treatment of news events, important public questions and current literature, contains a group of out-of-door articles, the majority of them carefully and fully illustrated. Most notable among these articles in this year's Recreation Number is the first installment of Stewart Edward White's serial, "The Mountains." This may be called a companion series to White's "The Forest," which was published in "The Outlook" last summer. "The Mountains" describes and pictures the author's experiences in exploration and camping out in a section of a California Sierras very little known. Like "The Forest," it not only abounds in practical suggestions for camping and woods life, but is infused with the spirit and love of nature.

Africa, the land of adventure, of heroism, of degradation, and of martyrdom has a large place in the "Missionary Review of the World" for June. The articles present many phases of life and work in various parts of the Continent, and make interesting and profitable reading. Rev. Robert H. Milligan, of West Africa, describes in dark colors "Heathenism as it is in West Africa," and Rev. Melvin Fraser gives in contrast "The Brighter Side of Darkest Africa." A very important subject is fully discussed by Rev. H. B. Bridgman, who gives the history and significance of the "Ethiopian Movements in South Africa." No one can afford to be ignorant of these unfortunate conditions in the native churches. Encouragement is found in the article on "The New Egypt," by Dr. Charles R. Watson. An excellent biographical sketch tells of the life of that Prince of Missionaries, "Francois Coillard, the Apostle to the Barotsis."

A work in our homeland is described in an illustrated story of "Berea College and its Mission"—especially appropriate at this time of legislation against the co-education of the races. China, India and other lands are not neglected, and a review of the world-field occupies sixteen pages, etc.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"American Prohibition Year-Book for 1904." By Alonzo E. Wilson. Price, cloth, 35 cents; paper, 15 cents. Published by United Prohibition Press, 92 LaSalle Street, Chicago.

The current issue of this valuable book is packed from cover to cover with data which is of incalculable value to all who desire information on the subject of prohibition. It is well arranged and handy for reference.

"Family Record." Prepared and published by S. B. Shaw, 275 Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, 50 cents.

This is a well-bound and convenient book of about 250 pages, which has been arranged for preserving the family record. It contains a number of simple suggestions about making such a record; also carefully prepared blanks for marriage, kindred, family history, children's sayings and doings, funeral services, obituaries, etc., all systematically arranged.

"From Talk to Text." By Addison Ballard. Published by Longmans, Green & Co., 91 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. Price, $1.00.

The title of this helpful little volume suggests the method employed in treating a number of subjects which deal with religious experience and faith. The author takes facts as they appear in everyday life, and so arranges them that they illuminate texts of scripture. He has thus treated "The Parallax of Pain," "Passing Away of Fulfillment," "Better Than Miracle," and kindred subjects.

SISTER'S TRICK.

But all Came out Right.

How a sister played a trick that brought rosy health to a coffee fiend is an interesting tale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, physical wreck, yet clinging to the poison that stole away my strength because for a fleeting moment it stimulated my weakened powers. I mocked at Postum and would have none of it.

"One day my sister, Mrs. U. S. Showalter, substituted a cup of crisp, hot Postum for my morning cup of coffee, but did not tell me what it was. I noticed the richness of it, and remarked that the coffee tasted fine, but my sister did not tell me I was drinking Postum for fear I might not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me Postum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, more tireless, got a better color in my sallow cheeks and a clearness to my eyes, then she told me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthening life-saver she had given me in place of my morning coffee. From that time I became a disciple of Postum and no words can do justice to the good this cereal drink can do. I will not try to tell it, for only after having used it can one be convinced of its merits." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten-days' trial shows Postum's power to rebuild what coffee has destroyed. There's a reason.

"A Preacher's Story of His Work." By W. S. Rainsford. Published by The Outlook Co., New York. Price, $1.25, net.

The remarkable career of W. S. Rainsford is here couched in his characteristic language. It is graphic, frank, full of human interest, and clearly defines the position of the author. It is well-illustrated in his words, "The church has always had a message from God to the people." If a man only tries to do the best he knows, and talks what he believes, he will have as much power and influence at one point of his experience as at another. I never, so far as I know, influenced people more for good than in those green, unripe days when I was simply praying and preaching the best I knew." The work is full of suggestive thought, and while many things which are therein set forth are not agreeable to the practices of Protestants in general, they are all matters which deserve serious consideration. Here is a paragraph:

"Since I came to New York, below Twentieth Street, forty churches have moved up-town, and over 300,000 people have moved into that section of the city from which forty churches have gone. That is the great mistake the Protestant churches have made. They are all alike. Their whole idea of church relations is based on the family that can live in a twenty-foot house. As soon as that social unity moves away from them they are lost."

The only way to keep religion is to give it away to other people.

How easily and contentedly we speak of Jesus Christ as our example. Do we realize what it means? If we did, it would revolutionize our life. Do we begin to know our Bible as He did? Do we begin to pray as He did? How thoughtful He was for others, how patient toward dullness, how quiet under insult? Think of what it meant for Him to take a basin and towel like a slave and wash the disciples' feet! Do we stoop to serve? Can anyone say of us, as was said of Him, that we go about "doing good?" Think of His words, servants of His: "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." "Christlike" is a word often on our lips. Do not speak it too lightly. It is the heart of God's predestination. It is our high calling.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

WORLD'S FAIR.

Great Coach Excursions via Pennsylvania Railroad.

June 9th, 16th, 23d and 30th are the next dates for great coach excursions to St. Louis via Pennsylvania Railroad, on account of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. The rates for these excursions have been fixed at such a low figure that they afford those of limited means an opportunity of seeing the World's Fair at an exceptionally small cost. The unusual success attending the first Pennsylvania Railroad excursion indicates that these will be very popular.

Special trains of standard Pennsylvania Railroad coaches of the most modern pattern will be run on the above-mentioned dates from New York, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Altoona and Pittsburgh, directly through to St. Louis, with ample stops for meals at convenient hours. Each train will be in charge of a Tourist Agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The rates will be the same as for the first excursion, May 10th, $20.00 from New York, $18.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

Specific information regarding time of special train and connections, and rates from principal stations east of Pittsburgh, will be announced shortly.

IT PAID TO KNOW.

A striking instance of the profit of knowing as much as one can outside of one's routine duties is given below.

Ex-Senator Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia, began his railroad career as a conductor on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. One day John M. Garrett, president of the road, and a party of friends were on Davis's train, making an inspection of what is known as the "second division"; that is, from Martinsburg to Cumberland. Garrett asked the conductor some questions about the villages and the country through which the train passed. The answers surprised the president, as he told not only all about the villages, but also made suggestions as to how the traffic of the road could be increased by reaching into the timber and mining lands near, and how expenses could be cut down by changes in the freight schedules. He grew eloquent on the subject and showed that he had given it thorough study.

Finally Garrett said: "Is there anything you don't know about the road and the country through which it passes?"

"I don't think there is," Davis modestly replied. Garrett laughed, but a week later Davis got his first promotion, and, within a few years, he was an officer of the road. His knowledge of West Virginia's resources made him a millionaire later.—Ex.

This notion of taking everything as God's gifts which so robs life of sorrow! It is the everlasting feeling of the fountain behind the stream.—Phillips Brooks.

HOPE.

*You speak of Hope and point me to a child
'Neath blossom-laden boughs, with face upturned
In golden sunlight free and undefiled
With smiling eyes wherein tears never burned.*

*That is not Hope—that is not Hope, my soul,
'Tis only youth's glad confidence and glee,
What when the crashing storms of sorrow roll?
What when Spring's blossoms lost and scattered be?*

*Hope—the far light that steals across the gloom,
Hope—the one star that shines through prison bars;
Though all the rest go crashing down to doom Unconquered still, she watches 'neath the stars.*

*Frail yet undying when all else hath died,
Bent low by pain, blinded by grief and tears,
Still through the dark and storm, whate'er betide,
Still Hope lives on through all the weary years.*

*They do thee bitter wrong who call thee light
And glad of heart. We who were lost in woe,
We who have heard thy music through the night
Of death and pain, we who have suffered, know.*

BE NOT ANXIOUS.

WE have heard in the last few years very much about "a religion of healthy-mindedness," or a "sunny religion," as it is sometimes called. What is the secret of cheerfulness? How can a man in a world like ours live on "the housetop"? There are various ways which men have tried to reach the life of calm and cheer, though they are not all religious ways. One way is that of the old pleasure-loving philosophers. They shut their eyes on all that was hard and disagreeable, and lived for momentary joy. Their motto was: "While we live, let us live, therefore eat, drink and be merry." They made pleasure the sole aim of life, and they avoided everything that would interfere with pleasure. This theory worked for a little while, as long as the bloom and vigor of youth lasted, but it was a very poor method of life for a person who had any of the world's work to do, or who had begun to discover how complex and difficult human existence is.

The Stoic took the other tack. "What is the use of worrying and fretting, or being anxious? It does no good. Take things as they come. Play the man. Face life; face death. Do your duty and stop whining. The good man counts all paths alike—the hard and the easy." This spirit and attitude often produced a very fine person. There was something strenuous and heroic about it. But it made a cold, hard type of man—often very self-righteous and self-sufficient. It killed out the feelings and steeled a man to endure and to suffer without showing that he cared. It is not true that the best man is indifferent. There is something higher than that. "Be not anxious," said our Saviour. "Take no worrying thought for all the things that the heathen trouble themselves about." Why not? How can it be avoided? What is the secret? "You are children of a Heavenly Father, who knows what you need, who provides for the birds, who clothes the flowers of the field, and who much more has you in care."

The secret of Christ's "healthy-mindedness" is found in His confidence in God. He refuses to get an easy life by seeking only pleasure. He never seeks to gain peace by steeling His heart and by becoming indifferent to the difficult cups and the painful experiences. He conquers by throwing Himself upon the love of His Father. He looks at everything from above, and He persistently refuses to take any views through the low-lying fog. The problems of gaining a huge fortune, of making a great career, of being "popular" and "successful" will, of course, call for much anxious thought. "But do not seek eagerly after such things," is Christ's answer. "Seek the kingdom of heaven, seek righteousness, seek to be like your Father, seek to be rich in God," and these pursuits will require no anxiety—for "your Father is more ready to give than you are to receive." In most of our eager pursuits we are after things of which the supply is limited. If somebody gets in ahead of us we shall lose. We hurry and struggle; we worry and have anxious thought. But the moment we turn to seek the real "goods of life" the supply exceeds the demand. There is no need of anxiety and worry. If we ask we receive; if we hunger we are filled.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING reduced the period of its sessions this year to about one week, whereas they have formerly occupied nearly two weeks. Much valuable time was saved by printing many reports before yearly meeting occurred, so that it was not necessary to read them in the meeting. Some matters, too, were put in the hands of committees and so not spread in detail before the meeting. On the whole the new plan seems to have worked well. The main danger will be that there will be too little time, in the crowding of business, for the cultivation of the inner life, which has always been a strong feature of all our yearly meetings. When Friends come together from city and country to transact the affairs of the Church, it is extremely important that this annual meeting shall be a time for heightening the spiritual power of the body, and for giving new vision to the younger membership.

A generation ago much of the time of the business meeting was occupied with preaching and prophesying. That custom has largely ceased, and large opportunity has instead been given for ministry and exhortation in devotional meetings and meetings for worship. But the shortening of the yearly meeting period of necessity reduces these opportunities to rather narrow limits.

It may result in putting more spiritual life and power into all the business of the Church, so that the flow of the Spirit from soul to soul which marks the highest times of worship shall appear through all the work of the Church. Such a leveling up would be a great gain, but if it does not come there will surely be a loss suffered by the shortening of the time. There are many indications that London Yearly Meeting this year was a time of life and power. It was not marked by the consideration of any absorbing question, as has been the case for the past few years. The York Conference on the Ministry had made it unnecessary to deal at length with the question of "recording," and yet it was evident that the supreme problem of the Church was felt to be the problem of ministry. How to edify the membership and to reach the unspiritualized in all ranks of society—this was, and is everywhere, the main question of a religious body. Our own Joseph John Mills, who was present at the yearly meeting, spoke upon this subject with much insight, and his words came as a fresh message for the time.

The Home Mission Committee, which corresponds to our evangelistic and pastoral committee, reported that no less than 3,700 persons had visited meetings for religious service, which would be an average of seventy-four every week. It was noted that the additions to the membership indicated that it took thirty old members to bring in one new one.

Some Friends took a discouraging view of the small results of the religious activities of a year; others felt that there were profound influences proceeding from the Society which could not be set down in figures or put into a report.

The moral attitude of the yearly meeting was, as it usually is, splendidly clear. It dealt with the Eastern war, with South African relief, on the condition of the slaves and freed men in Pemba, on betting and gambling, and on the new licensing bill. There was a proper desire expressed that the yearly meeting and meeting for sufferings might keep absolutely free from politics, and aim only at moral issues. The meeting adjourned to meet next year in the city of Leeds.

FRIENDS IN NEW ENGLAND.

In the spring of 1656 the first Friends who ever set foot on New England soil landed in Boston, and were at once escorted to the jail, and very soon after, for their "very dangerous, heretical and blasphemous opinions," were banished to Barbadoes. These were Mary Fisher and Anne Austin. Two days after these "dangerous" women left the harbor, the ship "Speedwell" arrived at the same port with eight "people commonly known by the name of Quaker" on board. Their boxes were at once searched for "erroneous books and hellish pamphlets." The leader of this little band was Christopher Holder. They, too, were sentenced to banishment from the colony. No sooner was he back in England than Christopher Holder gathered another band and sailed again for America in the ship "Woodhouse," which the Lord steered, "as He did Noah's ark, wherein He shut up a few righteous persons and landed them safe even at the hill Ararat." It has been truly said that "the germ of the American Friends' Society was enshrined in that little craft." This famous ship reached America in 1657. Four years later the first yearly meeting in America was held on Rhode Island, and these annual gatherings have, so far as can be discovered, been held every year since.

For the first time in its history the yearly meeting will assemble this year at Providence, and two weeks later than it has formerly been held. The change has been made for the express purpose of giving the younger members, who are in school and college, an opportunity to attend. A special meeting* is to be held this year for the younger members, and it is to be hoped that great results—permanent and far-reaching—may follow. There are those who are inclined to take a discouraging view of the situation in New England. The meetings are widely scattered. The Friends of wealth have largely disappeared from membership. The ministry is not as abundant or as powerful as the needs demand. The gains are very small. The interest in many places runs low. There is a lack of inspiring leadership. All this may be true, and more still might perhaps be said on the discouraging side. But go back for a moment to the days of Christopher Holder. He was 26 years old when the ship "Woodhouse" landed. All the forces in New England were against him. Only God was on his side! But he knew that God was on his side, and in four years enough Friends had been gathered to make a yearly meeting possible. The really discouraging thing is that anybody should be discouraged! We only need the heroic faith and energy of these early Friends to shake again these New England States. There are four thousand members, with noble ancestry and a splendid history, behind them. The name of "Quaker" is no longer a disgrace, and nobody calls our pamphlets "hellish." Our women ministers are no longer whipped through the streets at the cart's tail. On the contrary, Friends are honored and respected. Their message is welcomed. If they do not influence the world about them, it is their own fault. They are needed. They are wanted. The heroic faith and energy must not fail. We must now rise up and do the work of the Lord. May the coming yearly meeting in Providence prove an inspiration for a new mission and a greater career of service.

ANOTHER WORD ABOUT EPISTLES.

If the suggestion which was made two weeks ago in reference to epistolary correspondence is to be effective, it will be necessary for yearly meetings to appoint the Epistle Committee to hold over between annual meetings. In the crowded period of a short yearly meeting it is well-nigh impossible to produce a satisfactory document, particularly if the new plan is adopted of making the epistle mainly an account of the progress of the year. The committee which is to prepare this document that is to go out to all the other bodies will need to make a careful study of the entire field of activity of the yearly meeting. The committee will need to have in advance the reports from the quarterly meetings and from all the important standing committees. These reports will be studied and digested, and a view of the year's work will be produced. If it is well done, it will be of great value to the meeting itself as well as to all the meetings to which it goes. But if it is done in a hurried, inaccurate way, it will be good for nothing to anybody. An essential condition for the working of the plan is a "hold-over" committee, with a chairman who will attend faithfully to the work for which he or she is appointed.

THE FIRST DECLARATION OF QUAKER FAITH.

"A Declaration of Faith, And an exhortation to Obedience thereto, issued by Christopher Holder, John Copeland and Richard Doudney, while in Prison at Boston in New England, 1657.

"Whereas, it is reported by them that have not a bridle to their tongues, that we, who are by the world called Quakers, are blasphemers, heretics, and deceivers; and that we do deny the scriptures, and the truth therein contained: therefore, we, who are here in prison, shall in a few words, in truth and plainness, declare unto all people that may see this, the ground of our religion, and the faith that we contend for, and the cause wherefore we suffer.

"Therefore, when you read our words, let the meek spirit bear rule, and stand out of prejudice, in the light that judgeth all things, and measureth and manifesteth all things.

"As (for us) we do believe in the only true and living God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath made the heavens and the earth, the sea and all things in them contained, and doth uphold all things that he hath created by the word of His power. Who, at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in times past to our fathers by the prophets, but in these last days he hath spoken by His Son, whom He hath made heir of all things, by whom He made the world. The which Son is that Jesus Christ that was born of the Virgin; who suffered for our offenses, and is risen again for our justification, and is ascended into the highest heavens, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father. Even in him do we believe; who is the only begotten Son of the Father, full of grace and truth: And in Him do we trust alone for salvation; by whose blood we are washed from sin; through whom we have access to the Father with boldness, being justified by faith in believing in His name. Who hath sent forth the Holy Ghost, to wit, the Spirit of Truth, that proceedeth from the Father and the Son; by which we are sealed and adopted sons and heirs of the kingdom of heaven. From the which Spirit, the Scriptures of truth were given forth, as, saith the Apostle Peter, 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' The which was written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come; and are profitable for the man of God, to reprove, and to exhort, and to admonish, as the Spirit of God bringeth them unto him, and openeth them in him, and giveth him the understanding of them.

"So that before all (men) we do declare that we do believe in God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit; in (which) is declared what was the beginning, what was the present, and was to come.

"Therefore, all (ye) people in whom honesty is, stand still and consider. Believe not them who say, Report, and we will report it—that say, Come, let us smite them with the tongue; but try all things, and hold fast that which is good. Again we say, take heed of believing and giving credit to reports; for know that the truth in all ages of the world, hated, persecuted and imprisoned, under the name of heretics, blasphemers, and "

"that sheweth you the secrets of your hearts, and the deeds that are not good. Therefore, while you have light, believe in the light, that ye may be children of light; for, as you love it and obey it, it will lead you to repentance, bring you to know Him in whom is remission of sins, in whom God is well pleased; who will give you an entrance into the kingdom of God, an inheritance amongst them that are sanctified. For this is the desire of our souls for all that have the least breathings after God, that they may come to know Him in deed and in truth, and find His power in and with them, to keep them from falling, and to present them faultless before the throne of his glory; who is the strength and life of all them that put their trust in Him; who upholdeth all things by the word of His power; who is God over all, blessed for ever. Amen.

"Thus we remain friends to all that fear the Lord; who are sufferers, not for evil doing; but for bearing testimony to the truth, in obedience to the Lord God of life; unto whom we commit our cause; who is risen to plead the cause of the innocent, and to help him that hath no help on the earth; who will be avenged on all his enemies, and will repay the proud doers.

PRAYER IN THE LIFE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

BY CHARLES E. JEFFERSON.

Whether we pray as much as our fathers is a question, but that we do not pray as much as we ought is a certainty. And there are reasons, one of which is that we are busy, and prayer requires time. We move at a faster pace than any preceding generation. There are more things to do, more books to read, more luxuries to enjoy, more places to go than our fathers ever knew. The principle of competition is working out in our modern world certain alarming results, one of which is the raising of the strenuousness of life to the breaking point. The race is to the swift, the battle is to the strong, and the struggle for existence, to say nothing of supremacy, is something fierce and unprecedented. The degree to which business men are to-day absorbed by their business, and society women by their social obligations, and all sorts of men and women by their tasks and pleasures, makes one wonder whereunto this thing is going to grow.

The immediate effect of this external pressure, this everlasting "step lively" which the universe shouts in our ears is a breaking down of the disposition to indulge in any of those mental operations which require leisure and repose of spirit. The growing demand for short sermons and light plays and short stories and scrappy newspapers indicates an increased disinclination among large numbers of our people to engage in serious trains of thought. Indeed the very capacity for sustained attention to high and noble themes has been in thousands totally destroyed. Christians though not of the world are yet in the world, and never escape entirely the spirit of their land and time.

The temper of the age is always reproduced in the life of the Church, and the habits of professing Christians are largely modified by the habits of the people among whom they live. Many a Christian, if asked why he prays so little, would answer, "I haven't the time." In the morning there is a hasty breakfast and a dash for the cars; in the evening there is a depletion of nervous energy which craves the pillow instead of any form of religious exercise. Jesus often rose a great while before day in order that He might pray. But His followers in the twentieth century, kept up late at night, must sleep until working time if they are to do the duties of the coming day. To spend a whole night in prayer nowadays would mean a reduction of physical vitality below the point at which effective work is possible. Caught in this mill-race of modern life, what is a Christian to do?

Moreover, the science of a universe governed by law which is universal and unchangeable has raised anew in many thoughtful minds the query whether prayer is of practical value; and in these utilitarian times the average man carries along with him only what he feels convinced is of use. Nowadays it is the man who works whom heaven seems to befriend, and prayerful saints unless alert and energetic are left hopelessly behind. It is the boast of one of our most successful self-made men: "A lot of my neighbors have been praying for years, and to-day they have nothing. I have never prayed at all, and yet I have everything." If hurry has largely banished family worship from Christian homes, skepticism has strangled it in many a Christian closet.

We need to sit down with our New Testament and think the matter all over again. Certain facts are conspicuous and indisputable. There is in the unspoiled heart an instinct which prompts to prayer. This instinct is universal, and, in our greatest moments, irresistible. On sunny days when the flowers are blooming and life is lovely as a pleasant dream, the heart may be so satisfied with the things of time and sense that it loses the desire to pray, but when the sun is turned into darkness and the moon into blood, and the stars fall from heaven on some terrible day of sickness or bereavement or overwhelming calamity, the heart stands up and instinctively cries out to God.

What we do naturally in our greatest moments, when life is at its deepest, must be prompted by the Eternal Spirit in whom we live and move and have our being. Even though we cannot name all the reasons why prayer should have a place in the processes of the unfolding world, we may be sure that the place has been divinely fixed, and that in the midst of all the mechanism of an orderly universe, the forth-putting of human energy in the form of prayer works results both genuine and enduring.

This testimony of an indestructible instinct is supported by the life and teaching of the Supreme Man. In Jesus of Nazareth man came to his best estate, and what he did it is normal and best for all men to do. Jesus prayed. The evangelists give large space to this feature of His life. He was a man of prayer, and those nearest to Him early suspected a connection between His praying and His mighty works. Mothers brought to Him their children that He might pray over them, and His disciples importuned Him to teach them how to pray. To all such requests Jesus made swift and glad response. His teaching in regard to prayer is explicit and emphatic. He knows that prayer lays a strain on the mind which men with difficulty endure, but He declares that men ought nevertheless always to pray and not to faint.

There is no other form of Christian work at which so many Christians faint as prayer. To subdue the faculties of the soul to reverence and to prostrate them before the throne of grace is the highest and most difficult of all acts of the human spirit. Under the strain of this arduous enterprise men stumble and grow discouraged and swoon. It is noteworthy that both of Jesus' parables on prayer, that of the importunate widow and the importunate friend at midnight emphasize the necessity of persistency. Men must pray, and keep on praying and not allow themselves to grow discouraged or surrender. "Follow me," the Master says, and when we follow Him we find Him praying. His last breath on the cross was a prayer. Now if the supreme soul, the sovereign spiritual genius of our race, the eternal Son of God found relief and strength and joy in praying, foolish are we if we allow any new conceptions of mind or matter to rob us of our privilege and birthright.

"After this manner, therefore, pray you." Everything depends on our catching the "manner." "When you pray say, Father." That is the place to begin. If we begin with God as king, or moral governor, or judge, the heart is chilled at the start. If we begin with Latin words such as "omnipotent," "omnipresent," "omniscient," the prayer freezes on our lips. Jesus began his prayers with "Father"; we must do the same. It is only in a filial atmosphere that the heart easily prays. "Hallowed be thy name." How high that is. "Thy kingdom come." How great that is. "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." How wide that is. These colossal petitions must move at the forefront of all our prayers. It is proper to ask for earthly good, but such petitions must be after this manner: "Give us this day our daily bread." How modest that is. Not a word about sugar plums or luxuries, but just bread, and no more of that than is essential. "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Our prayers must end as they begin, with a petition that God's will may be done. The little cry for earthly good must be swallowed up in the music of the heart's desires for the advancement of our Father's glory.

How often should a Christian pray? is a question sometimes asked, and Christ's answer is the best, "Always." There are certain realms in which mathematics can play no part. Simon Peter once tried to introduce arithmetic into the realm of forgiveness, but Jesus told him it had no place there. Neither has it any place in the realm of prayer. A child never counts the number of times he speaks each day to his father, nor do Christians when fully grown count the times they speak to God.

Speak to Him thou, for He hears and Spirit with Spirit can meet—
Closer is He than breathing, and nearer Than hands and feet.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

The Friends of New York met in their two hundred and ninth annual gathering at Glens Falls on Sixth-day, Fifth month 25th, continuing until Second-day evening, the 30th. The yearly meeting proper was preceded, as usual, by the meeting of ministry and oversight on Fifth-day, and was followed by a conference of workers on Third-day. Though not quite so largely attended as usual, the meeting throughout was one of unusual interest, and was blessed of the Lord by the manifest presence and power of His Holy Spirit in definite blessing to souls and in a beautiful spirit of harmony and Christian fellowship in all its sessions.

In the meeting of ministry and oversight much interest was awakened in the report of a committee appointed at last meeting to enquire into the state of the ministry and report on ways and means of making it more efficient. At the suggestion of this committee it was decided to call a conference of workers, to follow the close of the yearly meeting, and later the yearly meeting itself appointed a committee to conduct a similar conference next year.

On Fifth-day evening there was a public meeting of the Christian Endeavorers, addressed by Allen Jay, of Indiana, from the text, "Occupy till I come," in which he clearly showed the necessity of developing the whole man, heart, mind and body, for God, and, instead of the idea of being good for fear we might die, we should desire to be good in view of the fact that we might be permitted to live many years with all our possibilities for doing good. Following the address, the local Endeavor Society served refreshments to all present, and a very pleasant and profitable evening was spent, with ample opportunity for all strangers to become acquainted.

The yearly meeting was greatly blessed by the presence and ministry of an unusual number of visiting ministers, the following ministers being present with credentials from their respective meetings: Frances W. Thomas, Allen Jay and Leanah H. Hobson, from Indiana; J. Walter Malone, Elizabeth G. Underhill, Clara L. Graves, Walter S. Aldrich, Wallace E. Gill and Frederic J. Cope, of Ohio, and Albert A. Baily, of Kansas.

Devotional meetings were held at 8 a.m. and 6.45 p.m. throughout the yearly meeting, and proved especial seasons of refreshing, and resulted in many definite blessings to souls in seeking both pardon and power, and we doubt not that the future will reveal that here some souls received the touch of the live coal from off the altar, that has purified their lips and sent them forth as messengers of God. J. Walter Malone had charge of the morning services, while various ones of the visiting Friends conducted the evening meetings, and the freedom of the Spirit was manifest in all.

This is the first year that New York Yearly Meeting has supported a worker in the field for evangelistic and church extension work, and the report of J. Lindley Spicer, the general superintendent having this work in charge, was a means of great encouragement to the meeting. He was continued in the work for another year, and in response to the call for contributions for the support of this work a collection of $809 was taken, which was about $250 more than was raised last year. While there has been very little reaching out in the surrounding fields during the year, yet there has been a manifest strengthening of our weaker meetings, and some meeting houses that have had their doors closed for some time have been again opened, and a much more hopeful spirit is manifest from all parts of the field. Nor has this newly-awakened interest in our home field slackened in the least our interest in the foreign field. On the other hand, when the report of the Missionary Board was made, and a call extended for funds to continue that work, Friends responded gladly with a subscription amounting to $1,000.64, an increase of more than $100 over last year. So the workers in both the home and foreign fields return to their labors feeling that they have a united people with them, not only praying God's blessings on the work, but willing that God should use them and theirs in the establishing of His kingdom in the earth.

One of the features of the public meetings held each evening at 8 o'clock was a number of lectures illustrated by stereopticon views. In this way Dr. George A. Barton, of Bryn Mawr College, reviewed the life of Christ, with views from Palestine, in connection with the Bible School work; while in like manner Carolena M. Wood and George D. Hilyard gave glimpses of our mission work in Mexico and High Point, N. C., on behalf of the Missionary Board. These lectures proved not only instructive, but brought those fields that have seemed so far away close at hand, so that we now feel that we are really acquainted with the work and would even be able to recognize some of the people for whom we have been laboring should we meet them.

President Isaac Sharpless, of Haverford College, on Seventh-day evening delivered a very instructive address on the subject of "Education in the South," which was of special value in that it revealed to us the importance of just such work as we are attempting to do for the negroes at High Point, N. C.

The report of the trustees of Oakwood Seminary shows that the year has been a very prosperous one; the attendance has increased, and the work from both the literary and religious standpoint has been very satisfactory. There has been a strong religious influence in the school, and at the present time nearly every student there is a professing Christian, taking more or less part in the religious meetings of the societies. Principal Samuel H. Hodgin will continue in charge of the school the coming year, and we believe the school is worthy and will receive the patronage of Friends.

A greatly-increased demand for Friends' books, and the recent publication of some new books of special value to Friends was a very encouraging feature of the report of the Book and Tract Committee, which evidences a renewed interest not alone on the part of Friends, but also of the outside world, to know more of the history of our branch of the Church of Christ, and to understand the principles that underlie it.

During the yearly meeting a large consignment of Friends' books for free distribution was received from Joshua L. Baily, of Philadelphia, and they were eagerly received by those present.

On First-day Friends' ministers occupied nearly all of the pulpits of Glens Falls and vicinity, some going to Sandy Hill, while others conducted an open-air meeting in Crandall Park, and three mission meetings were held in the country, from one of which came the news of two conversions. At Friends' Meeting House Frances W. Thomas preached in the morning from Psa. 19: 7: "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul," and although this beloved father in Israel is now in his 82d year, yet the Lord has so graciously preserved him to us that he was enabled to deliver a very powerful appeal to the unconverted to accept the Saviour in the conversion of their souls. In the afternoon J. Lindley Spicer and Frederic J. Cope conducted a children's meeting, at which more than a score of children and young people were definitely blessed in either conversion or consecration, and it was a sight that brought tears of rejoicing to many eyes.

Allen Jay and J. Walter Malone preached in the evening from the call of Christ to the multitude, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." The meeting was one of deep spiritual interest, and a large number of those present gave testimony to the blessing of the Lord on their souls.

The yearly meeting concluded its labors Second-day evening with a conference on evangelistic and church extension work, in which J. Walter Malone spoke on "Methods of Religious Work," and Allen Jay, on "Church Extension Work." These speakers were followed by a number of the ministers of the yearly meeting in two-minute talks on various subjects of vital interest to the work.

Many of the ministers and workers remained over Third-day, to be at the conference of workers called by the meeting of ministry and oversight, and, though the various speakers had very little opportunity to prepare themselves on the various topics assigned, yet all succeeded in bringing out some very helpful suggestions, so that all who stayed felt not only repaid, but begin to look forward to the coming of the conference next year with anticipations of many good things that will be of value to us as servants of the King. The following subjects were treated during the three sessions of the conference: "How May the Saving Grace of Christ be Best Applied through Us to the Needs of the Day?" by Allen Jay; "Bible Study," Lindley M. Stevens; "Church History," Carolena M. Wood; "The Prophetic Gift," J. Walter Malone; "The Pastoral Gift," Elizabeth G. Underhill; "Meetings for Worship," Walter A. Commons; "The Use of the Library," Abijah J. Weaver; "Family Visiting," J. Lindley Spicer; "The Raising of Money," Amos Sanders.

The conference next year will be held at Poughkeepsie for two days preceding the yearly meeting, which will be held at the same place. The general topic will be "The Kingdom of God," and we return to our work thankful for the rich spiritual uplift that has come to us during this yearly meeting, and earnestly praying that this year may see the kingdom of God materially strengthened within the limits of New York Yearly Meeting.

THINGS SAID IN LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

[We reprint from the London "Friend" the report of a few of the addresses made during the yearly meeting on subjects of interest to all Friends.—ED.]

THE CHURCH AND THE NEED OF MINISTERS.

Joseph J. Mills had been touched by the expression "the motherhood of the Church." This was the highest possible expression of earthly love, and was not the concern of this Meeting over the ministry born of a love for souls? In some sense the question of the ministry was the question of the Church. Friends need not depart from their testimony as to the priesthood of all believers, yet inevitably it must decline if it had not an effective ministry. We who live under the New Covenant sometimes forget that the sacerdotal element of the Old Testament was never abolished. Though we have a High Priest, much of the service which was performed by the priests under the old system needs to be performed to-day. We do not offer burnt offerings daily, but it is still essential that the consciousness of sin should be kept alive in the hearts of men; somebody, somehow, must summon the people, though there be no outward priest to blow the trumpet. Someone must diagnose the sore, as of old. Spiritually, to-day, the functions of the priesthood must be fulfilled, and every believer has a part in this service; but God has appointed some to the special work of the ministry. Personal religion is beyond estimate in value, but religion which is "harnessed" is what the world needs. A religion that takes hold of the world around the Church is wanted. The character of the minister ministers as emphatically as does the spoken word, and is often more effective. "What you are speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say," said an American philosopher. Our ministry must be with authority if people are to be convinced, and such a ministry will spring out of the real desire of the Church that its members shall be sent forth into this work. Men and women thus dedicated will be the outcome of this travail for souls on the part of the Church. If the Church earnestly desires ministers, she must pray that men and women may be sent into the ministry. It is God's way of reaching men, by means of men. "The good seed are the children of the kingdom." God blesses tracts, books, efforts in philanthropy, etc., but the Church—if it would see a grand harvest—must sow men and women in the field of the world. The type is cold; if you want a living message you must have it from the hearts and lips of men. "If your sword is too short, add a step to it." Preaching is truth expressing itself in personality. Young people do not come into the ministry, because the Church has not prayed that they should. J. J. Mills thought we were too fearful about taking hold of the question of the ministry boldly and fearlessly. Would it not be better to talk in a more definite and practical way about the ministry—letting it be known that we do earnestly desire that men and women shall be called to preach? The time would come when meetings would rejoice overwhelmingly over numbers of young men and women who see visions, whom the Lord has called and empowered to preach.

THE WORK OF THE CHURCH.

George Cadbury, quoting from the "Religious Census of Greater London," in the arrangements for taking which he had some considerable part, said that in Greater London, with its six-and-a-half millions (including such places as Croydon) there was but an actual attendance of some 970 Friends in all the morning meetings for worship held on the basis of silence, but about three times this number at our mission meetings. He had often thought, what would have been the feelings of George Fox and those who suffered so much with him could they have anticipated two hundred years hence that the Society of Friends would be so nearly extinct in the metropolis. But London was only a type of the rest of England. The Midland counties could show no better attendance in proportion to the population. William Tallaek had shown that the same thing applied to Devonshire and Cornwall, and it applied to a still larger extent in Scotland. A few weeks ago one of the Quarterly Meetings in Pennsylvania had ceased to exist, and the same feeble excuse one so often hears in this country had been given, that Friends had moved out of the villages into the cities; whereas every one who had really tested aggressive Christian work knew that Friends had much greater opportunities in villages than in the cities. On looking at these returns the question had come to him, where were the children educated at our boarding schools? Only a small portion of them could be at our ordinary meetings. In many ways our mission meetings were much more like the early Friends' meetings than our ordinary meetings for worship, because at the former a real effort was made to win souls for Christ. We had made much of matters of arrangement, and had forgotten the great truths proclaimed by our forefathers, such as the non-necessity of outward ordinances, the inconsistency of war with the teaching of Christ, and a free Gospel ministry. Was there not a danger in so doing, of our largely neglecting our work as a Church to bring men out of darkness into the glorious liberty of the children of God?

J. Fyfe Stewart said the Tabular Statement must give them grave cause for thought. Judged by the standard of any other Church, our returns would show a decrease, because we depended wholly on the birthright membership, and the reception of children of admitted members. We failed to realize that God wanted the whole world to be brought to Himself. What minister amongst us could say that he had been during the past year, by his work in our meetings for worship, the means of the conversion of any soul? How many had been expecting this? How many had been working for it? How many had been praying for it? How much work did we give to bringing people into our meetings for worship, and endeavoring to make them joint heirs with us of the kingdom of God? Our meetings were too often regarded as things that would run themselves. Was it any good for us to continue to pray the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers into His harvest, unless we were doing our share in this particular work. He even thought that this difficulty often arose from our having too much faith. Let them look at the calm way in which many Friends curled themselves up in a corner, and determinedly would not look at those who were speaking from the gallery. If it were a question of politics they would look, because they would want to know what was to be said. Did we really believe that there were messages from God given to our ministers? The very essence of the helpfulness of a Friends' meeting arose from the fact that we did believe that God spoke through man. He believed that very largely the character of our statistics was the result of our attitude towards our meetings for worship. It was very difficult for Friends to realize that they must give themselves to the work of a Friends' meeting. And yet if any meeting could be found where two or three would give themselves up to the work of making people welcome and inviting them, what a very different state of things we should see there. If that were generally done, our statistics would begin to take a different form.

MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS AND POLITICS.

Thomas Hodgkin felt it right to give expression to a little fear on his own mind and on those of a few others lest the Yearly Meeting and Meeting for Sufferings in its corporate capacity should be drawn into taking a part in political matters. He was heartily glad of the minute of recognition of the action of the Government in regard to the French Treaty, but he did not think that the Meeting was called on to express an opinion on such a matter as the withdrawal of licensing control from the magistrates, although he very strongly opposed such withdrawal himself. It would be unfortunate if the Society were to assume the character of an organized committee to secure the return of one political party. He was very anxious himself to secure a change of Government; but if a minute from that table would bring that about, he should say, and he thought all would say, "Let it not go forth." The Meeting for Sufferings were trustees for a body of very various opinions. The members of the Meeting for Sufferings hardly knew perhaps what a great variety of thought there was in the Society on a great variety of matters. He believed that the unity of mind spoken of as existing in the early Church was on spiritual matters only; it was not desirable that there should be absolute unity on all political matters. He was very glad that there were Socialists amongst us, and also those who held differing opinions on the fiscal question. The Meeting for Sufferings should remember that it was their duty not to represent their own private opinions, but those opinions upon which they were tolerably certain that the whole Society was agreed. It would tend to lower the dignity of the action of the Meeting for Sufferings if it used its office of appeal or representation too often. It was not responsible for the Government of the country, and it need not be assumed that everything that was done by the Government with which we did not agree was done by us. Our protest should be reserved for broad general questions of principle.

SIXTH MONTH 26, 1904.

REVIEW.

Read Isaiah 53: 1-10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name. Phil. 2: 9.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 20.—Peter confesses the Christ. Mark 8: 27-38.
Third-day, Sixth mo. 21.—Jesus transfigured. Mark 9: 2-13.
Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 22.—Mission of the seventy. Luke 10: 1-16.
Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 23.—The prodigal son. Luke 15: 11-24.
Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 24.—Jesus teaches humility. Mark 10: 35-45.
Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 25.—The passover. Matt. 26: 17-30.
First-day, Sixth mo. 26.—Christ crucified. Mark 15: 22-39.

The lessons of the last quarter have all been concerning incidents or teachings which took place during the closing months of Christ's earthly life. Most of the teachings were primarily given to the disciples in order to prepare them for the great event which was to take place, and to fit them for the service which they were to perform for their Master and for the world. He endeavored to lead them into a fuller and clearer understanding of His mission, and of the spiritual nature of His kingdom. Brought up as they had been we cannot wonder that they were slow to comprehend the fullness of His teaching or the extent and spiritual nature of His kingdom.

In the visit of Christ to the heathen land of Tyre and Sidon, and His answer to the request of the Syro-Phenician woman, He taught that the prayer of true faith is recognized and answered no matter of what race or condition the suppliant may be.

In "Peter Confesses the Christ" Jesus teaches the condition of true discipleship—self-effacement, and also that even one's intimate friends may place temptation before us.

In "Jesus Transfigured" we are taught that the Law and the Prophets pass away, but Jesus remains. "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." Our mountain experiences, our seasons of communion are to make us better fitted to live upon the plain, and to help suffering humanity.

The "Mission of the Seventy" teaches that all followers of the Lord Jesus Christ should be ministers or workers at home or abroad—that "we are laborers together with God." Christ identifies Himself with His workers, shares their sorrows and their joys, and gives them strength for service. In "Prayer and Promise" we have the comforting assurance that to every one who asks in faith an answer will be given. Earnestness is a necessary condition. "If selfish man can be won by prayer and importunity to give, much more certainly will the bountiful Lord bestow" good things upon those who ask in faith.

In the lesson upon "Watchfulness" we learn that there is a watchfulness of opportunity and of duty. "The way to watch for the coming of Christ is to be faithful to every duty, to live the daily life Jesus would have us live."

In the "Prodigal Son" we have the graphic picture of man's folly and sin, contrasted with the tender love and compassion of a father. It was not until the son came to himself and arose and went that he proved that his repentance was genuine. When he did this his father did not wait for him, but ran to meet him and welcome him back. The truly repentant are always received with joy.

In "Jesus Teaches Humility" we are shown that the test of true greatness is humility. Whole-hearted service for God and for our fellow men is the badge of true discipleship. "For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

In the "Passover" we see that Christ followed the customs of His people when they did not conflict with His mission, but He made use of the custom to teach the deep spiritual lesson that as food is needful for the body, so the believer must spiritually feed upon Him in order to be sustained and to grow. We also see how one that was close to the Lord and heard His teachings, saw His miracles, and knew His blameless life, could yield to temptation and become a traitor.

In "Christ's Trial before Pilate" we see the innocent prisoner, the selfish, time-serving judge, the envious chief priests, and the fickle populace. A great lesson for all is the illustration of the vast importance of making a right choice. The people could have chosen Jesus, but they chose Barabbas—a robber.

In "Christ Crucified" we have the account of the most solemn event which the world has seen—the cruel death of Him "who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame"; "Who loved us and gave Himself for us."

In "Christ Risen" we have the crowning proof that He is the Son of God; the proof that there is immortal life beyond the grave; the joy of knowing that we have an ever-living Saviour, who loves us, and who will send the Holy Spirit to comfort, to sustain and to guide into all the truth.

Christ can and does transform men. He changes their character. Now, character is the hardest thing in the world to change. It can't be done by will. It can be done by Christ. He can take a drunkard and break his chains. He can take a sinner and save him. He can do this in an instant, or he can do it by steady process of change. The world would be hopeless if it were not for the presence in it of such a power.—Robert E. Speer.

TOPIC FOR SIXTH MONTH TWENTY-SIXTH.

SIGNS THAT INDIA IS BECOMING CHRIST'S.

Ps. 22: 22-31.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 20.—Promised. Ps. 2: 1-12.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 21.—To Abraham. Gen. 26: 1-5.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 22.—Through Christ. Isa. 44: 1-5.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 23.—All nations. Isa. 55: 1-5.

Sixth-day, Sixth mo. 24.—The invitation. Luke 14: 16-24.

Seventh-day, Sixth mo. 25.—The beginning. Acts 22: 15-18, 21.

Only about one hundred years have passed since a member of the House of Commons, interested in the British East India Company, said: "I had rather send shipload of devils to India than a shipload of missionaries." A few years later this attitude changed to one of indifference, and it was not until the great mutiny of 1857 that England was aroused and made to realize the importance of missionary effort. Now the Government grants every possible facility for the carrying on of such work, and one of India's greatest and most experienced statesmen recently said: "In my judgment, Christian missions have done more real, lasting good to the peoples of India than all other agencies combined."

Though much remains undone, enough has been accomplished during the last half century by educational work, by the preaching of the gospel to high and low alike, by the labors of women who have gained access to the secluded inmates of the zenanas, by mission hospitals and other works of love and mercy, to let in a flood of light, and to make manifest the festering corruption as well as the beggarly inadequacy of the native religious systems. An orthodox Hindu paper says of Mrs. Besant's laudations of Hinduism: "When an English lady of decent culture professes to be an admirer of Tantric mysticisms and Krishna worship, it behooves every well-wisher of the country to tell her plainly that sensible men do not want her eloquence for gilding what is rotten." Another phase of the awakening is shown in the remarks of a Hindu judge who urged his fellow townsmen to have their newly-founded school organized under the care of a missionary, not to make their children Christians, "but if you want your sons to become noble, upright men, put this school under the charge of the missionary and have the Bible taught in it daily: it will make your sons better men and you will be happier parents." Much as this leaves to be desired, it is far on the road to the end in view when the written word is treated with respect, and the opportunity is given to teach its deeper value and meaning.

A large number who are now leaders among the natives were educated at the mission schools, some making no outward profession of Christ, while others are pronounced Christians. The wonderful breaking down of caste lines, not yet complete, however; the great work done among the widows, and the destruction of social prejudice and legal disadvantage that even recently operated against Christian converts, are only a few of the proofs that the leaven of the kingdom is at work, and that more hopefully than ever before we may say, "India for Christ."

EXTRACTS FROM REPORT OF ANNUAL MEETING OF FRIENDS IN JAPAN.

The ninth annual meeting of Friends in Japan was held in Tokio from Fourth month 15th to 18th. . . .

The first session, on Sixth-day (Fourth month 15th) afternoon, was a time of earnest waiting upon God. As the meeting began just as the school was closing for the day most of the girls were present to join in the season of intercession for God's blessings upon the meetings to follow. G. Binford gave a brief message concerning "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," etc.

The session in the evening of the same day was given to the consideration of the "Message of the Society of Friends in Japan." It is interesting that the desire for the presentation of this subject originated with the Japanese Friends. Mr. Kato spoke at some length on two phases of the message: 1st. A spiritual religion, as distinct from, or independent of, all outward forms; 2d. The living Christ, not forgetting the Christ of the cross and the atonement, but holding continually to the living Christ.

Gilbert Bowles spoke of the relation which the message of the Society of Friends bears to the Christian Church as a whole, and then gave some of the characteristics of the message. 1. Direct, personal and individual as contrasted with the mediatorial and priestly; 2. Real as contrasted with the typical and emblematic; 3. Spiritual as contrasted with the material on the one hand and the ceremonial and ritual on the other; 4. Universal as contrasted with local or national, . . . and emphasizing the work of the Holy Spirit upon all hearts.

The session on Seventh-day forenoon was given to the business affairs, consisting mainly of a consideration of the state of the work, as set forth in the reports from the different mission stations.

For the Tokio meeting C. Kaifu reported thirty-five new believers during the year. There are 8 Bible schools, with 859 pupils enrolled, taught largely by pupils from the Girls' School; average attendance at meetings, 80.

For Mito, Mr. Kato reported an active evangelistic spirit in the meetings, and 800 children enrolled in the Bible schools. . . . The Mito Christians are still working towards funds to build a meeting house. The leading centers for work centering about Mito are: 1. Komezaki, where there is a Bible class and an increase in the small number of believers; 2. Minato, where M. Mishima and wife have a hopeful field for work.

For Tsuchiura, B. Kida reported . . . among the Christians connected with Friends, there are officers.

merchants, basket makers and other occupations represented. An evening mid-week meeting is held, changing from one believer's house to another. The First-day morning meetings for Christians are small, but times of great blessing. There are many openings in surrounding villages. . . .

For Ishioka, C. Suzuki reported. . . . Work started five years ago; before that only a few lecture meetings. Lately, although no worker from Tokio or Mito can always be present on First-day, the Christians hold the regular meetings as usual. Three people have become Christians through the temperance meetings; twelve surrounding villages where work has been done. . . . Ishioka Christians lately impressed with a deep evangelistic spirit.

The meeting Seventh-day afternoon, Fourth month 16th, was held in the collection room in the school building, Sarah Ellis acting as leader. In the opening she quoted Matt. 28: 20: "Lo, I am with you always," and spoke of the help and benefit of "fellowship" one with another, and especially with Christ our Head. Then there was a sort of roll call. Those present from Tokio, Mito, Ishioka and Tsuchiura standing as the place was called, and one from each place repeating an appropriate text. Afterwards the Friends who were with us from England—George and L. Braithwaite and E. R. Gillett—were called on and responded. After a short time spent in prayer the Bible school work was brought forward. Mr. Suzuki spoke of its importance as giving access to so many homes. . . . Mr. Kida told of some of the children in one of his schools who gave a rin (equal to half a mill) each day out of their cake money to help pay for the rent of a room for another school. Eliz. Binford spoke of a little prayer circle held among the boys taught by their cook in his Bible class, begun entirely of their own accord, and continued bi-weekly during the holidays, as they needed the help more then. Mr. Kurama, a tailor, told of his difficulties in keeping the Sabbath. . . . A little more than a year ago he determined to close his business entirely (on the Sabbath), and how God had blessed him and cared for him, and that since then two at least of his helpers had become Christians.

After a short interval . . . we had a nice address from Lettice Braithwaite, on "Individual Faithfulness," . . . and a few words from S. M. Longstreth.

The session on Seventh-day evening was given to a consideration of the subject, "The Development of the Spiritual Life of New Believers." . . .

The First-day morning meeting for worship was well attended, almost all the seats being full. In the early part of the meeting mention was made of one fundamental principle held by Friends—Christ, the living Head of the Church, and hence to Him each individual Christian must look for guidance. The meeting was one long to be remembered because of the marked presence of God. . . . The encouraging epistle from the F. F. M. A., of Philadelphia, was given in English and Japanese, at this session, as it reached a larger number than at any other time.

On First-day afternoon the meeting was held in the sewing rooms . . . of the school building, where all could take off their shoes and sit around on the "tatami." Gilbert Bowles spoke on "Consecration." . . . Those who wished to ask forgiveness for any known sin which was keeping them from God, and those who longed for a fuller realization of the presence of the Holy Spirit, were encouraged to pray definitely for what was needed. The response was seen in the number of earnest prayers. . . . God was indeed in our midst.

At the opening of the First-day evening session a number offered special praise for the blessings received during the annual meeting. At this meeting, which was evangelistic in character, C. Suzuki spoke on "Christ the Way, the Truth, and the Life," and B. Kida . . . told impressively the old story of Jesus the Son of God and the Saviour of men. Three men indicated their desire to know more of Christianity.

The closing session was held at 5.30 o'clock on Second-day morning. This meeting was a time of blessing for the goodly number present. Elsie R. Gillett gave as a motto for the coming year, "Dwell deep."

Although the attendance from outside of Tokio was not large, the entire annual meeting was most helpful and impressive, giving us all more faith that God is working in our midst.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

J. Edgar Williams, of Greensboro, N. C., expects to attend the approaching session of Canada Yearly Meeting.

A small party of English Friends have arrived on this side with a prospect of attending the Haverford Summer School.

George Grubb, of Ireland, clerk of Dublin Yearly Meeting, has been on a flying visit to America. He was present at the morning meeting at Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on First-day, the 5th inst.

Thomas Newlin attended Earlham commencement, and is now settled in Chicago for a year's study in the University. His address will be Room 88, Middle Divinity Hall, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Edwin H. McGrew, clerk of Oregon Yearly Meeting, has finished his year of study at Haverford College, and is on his way toward Oregon, where he expects to be in time for the approaching yearly meeting.

London Yearly Meeting sent a message of love and sympathy to Dr. Richard H. Thomas, of Baltimore, who has for many weeks been extremely ill. The cable dispatch from London was a beautiful and touching mark of esteem.

A cordial invitation is extended to any Friend who may be visiting Atlantic City to attend the monthly meeting of the Atlantic City Branch of the F. F. M. A., to be held at the residence of the president, 158 North Carolina Avenue, on Fourth-day, the 22d inst., at 8 p.m.

Henry Lloyd Wilson, of Birmingham, has been appointed clerk of London Yearly Meeting, taking the place of John Morland. The new clerk is a young man, though he has already proved his fitness for such a responsible position by his service as assistant clerk of the yearly meeting and as clerk of the meeting for sufferings.

The Christian Workers' Training School at Marshalltown, Iowa, gave its first commencement exercises at the Friends' Meeting House, the 25th ult. The members of the class gave orations and all did well. The class address was delivered by Prof. Edwards, of Penn College, and was much appreciated by all. The baccalaureate sermon was given by Ezra Pearson. The meeting at Marshalltown greatly misses the students during the summer vacation season, but a live Christian Endeavor Society is maintained throughout the year with regular monthly business and consecration meetings.

Fairmount Monthly Meeting, Indiana, added twelve persons to its membership last month, four by request and a family of eight by certificate. This meeting is blessed with many talented and energetic workers among its young and middle-aged members, and is rich also in its heritage of old people. God sends all beautifully together in His service.

It is proposed to hold a meeting for young Friends during the sessions of New England Yearly Meeting, probably on first-day. It is hoped that every young member in the yearly meeting will make a special effort to be there. The meeting is the result of a deep concern which has been upon the hearts of a few Friends, and it is likely to be a memorable occasion.

The 6th inst. was observed in Friends' Meeting, Fairmount, Ind., as Missionary Day. In the morning the pastor, Enoch Harvey, preached a sermon from Acts 16: 10. In the evening Hariba W. Stephens, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, assisted by her husband, gave an address, illustrated by stereopticon views of missionary stations and workers. The offerings taken for the use of the Mission Board amounted to $166.37.

Union Quarterly Meeting was held at Highland, Boyd Co., Neb., the 14th and 15th ult., and seemed to impress every one who attended as being a season of more than ordinary divine favor. Wm. Perry, of Central City, a visiting minister, was present and delivered helpful gospel messages on Seventh- and first-days. Ira D. Kellogg, yearly meeting superintendent of temperance work, was also present and gave a lecture on seventh-day evening. Sixty signed the temperance pledge at the close of the lecture.

Northbranch Academy, Kan., closed a successful year on the 27th ult. As there were no graduates, the juniors furnished the program. Nearly 250 persons attended the exercises. After the literary program Helen Townsend and Vaden Liggett were presented with fountain pens, the reward for making the greatest improvement in penmanship. Over 150 volumes have been added to the Academy library during the year. Edna Goodwin will be retained as assistant next year. Professor F. H. Clark has resigned his place as principal to accept another position. As yet no one has been secured to take his place in the Academy.

Bangor Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held at Bangor, Iowa, the 26th to 29th ult. Many of the older Friends remarked that it was the best quarterly meeting they ever attended. After the business meeting of Ministry and Oversight, R. Hayes Puckett read a very carefully-prepared paper on the subject, "Are we as a church as evangelical and evangelistic as we should be?" An interesting discussion followed. A splendid missionary program was rendered Sixth-day evening. Seventh-day evening was devoted to Sabbath School work, addresses, etc. Seventh- and First-days, at 10 a.m., H. W. Pilot, of Oskaloosa, preached most logically. A number of other ministers were present and much favored.

A Ministers' and Workers' Conference was held at Spiceland, Ind., on the 3d inst. The day was full of blessing and interest throughout. Dr. T. R. Woodard, superintendent of evangelistic work of the quarterly meeting, opened the conference promptly at ten o'clock; then followed most interesting reports from the twelve meetings belonging to the quarter. The principal addresses were, "How Shall We Hold What We Have Gained," by Wm. P. Angell; "Who Is My Neighbor?" by Wm. Hayes; "Experience in Foreign Fields," by Mary White, and "What Constitutes Successful Endeavor," by Oscar Moon. All these addresses were most inspiring and helpful, especially the one by Mary White, a returned missionary, who has labored so earnestly and faithfully in Jamaica for nine years, but who was compelled to come home on account of ill health. The friends of Spiceland spread a bountiful dinner in the Endeavor room of the meeting house at the noon hour. These conferences have grown in interest, and are times of great refreshing and spiritual uplift.

At a meeting, recently held in Salem, Iowa, to commemorate the establishment of The Hague Court, the following was adopted:

"To prevent in future such wars as is now raging between Russia and Japan we suggest to the Boston Peace Congress, to be held in Tenth month, that the law of nations provide that any five nations who apprehend that two or more nations are about to engage in war with each other, shall file such information with The Hague Court, and ask that said court issue a summons to the said two or more nations to appear by proper representatives before said court, and show cause why they should not submit their differences to some tribunal for arbitration. If one or both of said nations shall refuse to obey said summons, or refuse to submit their differences, or to comply with the word in their case, the five or more nations shall, in the interest of peace, at once suspend and revoke all diplomatic, commercial and treaty relations existing between the five nations and the two or more nations. And such suspension shall be in force not less than ten years."

A movement is under way to organize a historical society in Philadelphia. The following circular has been issued:

"Believing that there is much of historical interest in connection with the history of the Society of Friends in America that should be collected and preserved, some Friends have thought it would be desirable to form a Historical Society for the purpose of collecting material for the elucidation of the history of Friends in America. With this end in view, there has been formed 'Friends' Historical Society in America.'

"We desire thy co-operation and assistance in furthering the object for which said Society has been organized, and also to present to, or deposit with it, any manuscripts, books, pictures, personal effects, etc., which may aid the work by illustration or otherwise.

"If thou desires to become a member or wishes further information, please to communicate with Isaac Sharpless, president, Haverford College, Pa., or Helen Hopkins Jones, secretary, Lansdowne, Pa.

"Signed: Isaac Sharpless, Joshua L. Baily, Jonathan Evans, George Vaux, James Emlen."

Many of the distinguished citizens of Providence, R. I., met on the 10th of this month to express their appreciation of the life and work of Augustine Jones, who is leaving Providence to take up his residence in Newton Highlands, Mass. The following words of appreciation were sent out with the call:

"As you are about to remove from the city, the undersigned, in the name of the many friends that you have made during your twenty-five years' residence in Providence, wish to express their hearty appreciation of the work you have done both in your chosen profession of teaching and as a public-spirited citizen—a man among men.

"We have recognized in you a happy mingling of broad-minded scholarship, the power of a contagious enthusiasm in imparting knowledge, and the ready sympathy which has won the confidence and loyalty of your pupils. We have found in you one always alive to the highest physical, mental and moral needs of the community of which you have felt the Friends School as well as yourself to be a living part; so that you have fearlessly assumed the responsibilities of an enlightened citizenship and set before the rising generation an example that has given force and point to the ideal of a liberal education—the making of good citizens—for the sake of which the school and the college are supported and encouraged by the State.

"We take this opportunity to assure you of our deep regret at the loss which the city and the State sustain in your removal from among us, and our hearty interest in your future welfare and happiness.

"It is proposed that a meeting be held at Friends School, Alumni Hall, on Friday evening, June 10th, at eight o'clock, to give further expression to our appreciation of your worth and work."

The historic Liberty Bell, after formal ceremonies, was placed in the Pennsylvania Building at the St. Louis Exposition one day last week. It will be on exhibition there until the close of the Exposition.

The United States Supreme Court has not been so far up with its work in years as at present. Adjournment for the summer leaves only 282 cases on the docket, the smallest number known since 1870. During the term just closed 449 cases were disposed of.

WISE WORDS.

A Physician on Food.

A physician of Portland, Oregon, has views about food. He says:

"I have always believed that the duty of the physician does not cease with treating the sick, but that we owe it to humanity to teach them how to protect their health, especially by hygienic and dietetic laws.

"With such a feeling as to my duty I take great pleasure in saying to the public that in my own experience and also from personal observation I have found no food to equal Grape-Nuts, and that I find there is almost no limit to the great benefit this food will bring when used in all cases of sickness and convalescence.

"It is my experience that no physical condition forbids the use of Grape-Nuts. To persons in health there is nothing so nourishing and acceptable to the stomach, especially at breakfast, to start the machinery of the human system on the day's work. In cases of indigestion I know that a complete breakfast can be made of Grape-Nuts and cream, and I think it is necessary not to overload the stomach at the morning meal. I also know the great value of Grape-Nuts when the stomach is too weak to digest other food.

"This is written after an experience of more than twenty years, treating all manner of chronic and acute diseases, and the letter is written voluntarily on my part without any request for it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

Look in each package for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

The chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture estimates the total area planted in cotton in the United States this season at 31,730,371 acres, an increase of 2,823,016 acres, or 9.8 per cent. upon the acreage planted last year.

The Maryland State Court of Appeals has removed the last obstacle to the completion of Gould's Western Maryland Railroad by means of which connection will be made with the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg Railroad, and the Wabash will be extended to tide-water at Baltimore.

"War news" last week came from Colorado. The soldiers and the miners fought pitched battles on the hillsides, and we read of intrenchments, stormings and killed and wounded. It is a terrible state of affairs. Martial law was declared in the Cripple Creek region and several union men were deported. "Death to unionism" in the Cripple Creek district is the slogan of the Citizens' Alliance.

The time must come when no highly-civilized community will tolerate mosquitoes. The convention of State and Provincial Boards of Health in Washington the past week has pointed the way in its declaration that Boards of Health everywhere should seek the means and the authority for treating swamp lands in the vicinity of large towns and cities with such substances as are now known to be destructive to the life of mosquitoes of all species.

Any one who is skeptical of the actual achievements of medicine must be shaken in his doubts by such figures as those given by Dr. Biggs, in a recent address. In comparing the present rate of mortality with that which prevailed in the seventeenth century, we have to recognize the general advance in social conditions which has brought about a sanitary improvement not consciously directed by scientific knowledge. It is none the less instructive to observe that the annual mortality of London from 1620 to 1643 was over 70 per 1,000. At the present time the annual death rate of London is slightly in excess of 17 per 1,000. This great contrast we may ascribe largely to public sanitation. In the decade between 1771 and 1780 the mean expectation of life at birth was calculated at 19.6 years. In 1894 it was calculated for London at 37 years. That is, in the course of a century the average duration of life was nearly doubled.

The decision of the Illinois Appellate Court in the case of certain employees, members of labor unions, arrested for picketing the complainant's place of business and interfering with men seeking employment, for the purpose of compelling the employer to sign an agreement providing for a closed shop, is one of the most definite deliverances upon freedom of contract, the right of employers to conduct their business in their own way and of employees to pursue their employment without molestation, yet delivered by any judicial tribunal. The agreement which the strikers sought to compel the complainant to sign provided, among other things, that he should employ none but members of certain labor unions, and that a sympathetic strike to protect union principles should not be regarded as a violation of the employees' contract. Upon the refusal of the employer to execute the agreement a strike was ordered, and 500 employees went out. The Court ruled that such an agreement was unlawful in that, if executed, it would tend to create a monopoly in favor of the members of the different unions, to the exclusion of non-union workmen.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS

1844. "Is the title of a very instructive picture drawn by Marcus Mole. BOOK REVIEWS.

"Glorious Praise." By W. H. Doane. Harvey D. Purnett, Louisville, Ky. Price, 35 cents.

This collection of songs contains an exceptionally large number of popular hymns, and is well suited for smaller congregations which are not able to procure larger hymnals.

"The Words of Jesus." Compiled by Albert Hallett. The Hallett Publishing Co., Los Angeles, Cal. Price, 10 cents.

This convenient little hand-book contains the words of Jesus arranged in a chronological order, with brief notes, giving the time and place in which each quotation is supposed to have been spoken. It is bound in flexible cloth, and is of a size suited to the vest pocket.

Orders were issued last week by several cotton mill managers instructing agents to curtail production on account of the depression in the textile industry. Many mills in southern and central New England have been running on short time all the spring, and at present about 50,000 operatives are affected.

Once more is the project of connecting England and France by rail up for consideration. The Paris Chamber of Commerce has quite enthusiastically adopted a report submitted by M. Peltreanu, one of its members and an engineer, which maintains that either a bridge over or a tunnel under the channel is entirely feasible, but which favors the tunnel scheme as much the less costly. He estimates that a tunnel could be dug for $50,000,000 francs, or about $50,000,000, while a bridge would cost $200,000,000.

HAS TRIED BOTH.

Travel for Health vs. Dieting.

A man who was sent to Europe for his health, and finally found cure in a little change in his diet, says:

"I was troubled with dyspepsia for five years, and two doctors here in Kenosha that treated me for over a year both told me there was no help for me. When I had an expert from Chicago, but still received no relief; then followed another expert from Chicago, who came to our house two times a month for four months. He gave me up like all the others, and told me to take a trip across the ocean, which I did in the year 1899, and came home about as bad as when I started. The doctors told me my stomach lining was full of sores. Then I began to study my own case, and learned of the diet recommended by the Postum Cereal Co., so I gave up coffee, pork and all greasy foods, and began using Postum Food Coffee. Gradually I got better and better, until I am well now as I ever was in my younger days, have no trouble and eat anything fit to eat.

"Sometimes away from home I am persuaded to drink coffee, but I only take a sip of it, for it tastes bitter and disagreeable to me, but the longer I use Postum the better I like it, and the better I feel. I could say a great deal more of my experience with Postum, but think this will give everyone a good idea of what leaving off coffee and using Postum can do." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GRATITUDE FOR THE LIVING.

Let us not forget, that if honor be for the dead, gratitude can only be for the living. He who has once stood beside the grave to look upon the companionship which has been forever closed, feeling how impotent there are the wild love or the keen sorrow to give one instant's pleasure to the pulseless heart or a tone in the lowest measure to the departed spirit for the hour of unkindness, will scarcely for the future incur that debt to the heart which can only be discharged to the dust. But the lesson which men learn as individuals they do not learn as nations. Again and again they have seen their noblest descend into the grave, and have thought it enough to garland the tombstone when they had not crowned the brow, and to pay the honor to the ashes which they have denied to the spirit. Let it not displease them that they are bidden, amid the tumult and the dazzle of their busy life, to listen to the few voices and watch for the few lamps which God has trimmed and lighted to charm and to guide them, that they may not learn their sweetness by their silence nor their light by their decay.

THE MESSAGE OF DESPAIR.

OUR correspondence frequently brings us accounts of sermons and addresses the main burden of which is an attack upon almost all present-day Christianity. The Church is described as a poor, weak, half-dead affair. Most Christian teachers are pronounced as unsound. Educational institutions are declared to be nurseries of scepticism. The world is pictured as slowly moving toward hopeless wickedness. In short, the message is out-and-out pessimism—a "gospel" of despair. One would think to read or listen that only the fires of the eternal judgment could ever cleanse this world, and that the stupendous mistake of the ages was the creation of such a wicked world. It is a part of the mission of those who preach this gospel of despair to attack everybody who does not join in preaching it. One goes to hear "good news" of hope and forgiveness and salvation, and he hears instead an attack on some Christian Church, or on some devout laborer who is trying to come up to the help of the Lord in overcoming the evil of the world.

This is all very pitiful and very destructive of faith. Few things weaken faith more than this method of indiscriminate attack upon sincere, honest religious effort. There would have been no Christian Church if Paul had gone to Corinth and attacked Peter, and Peter had gone to Rome and told the Romans that there was no soundness in the Philippian Church, and John had gone to Ephesus and preached on the hopelessness of saving the empire under Nero. Stephen would have had no shining face like an angel if he had had no message but one of despair and attack. Antioch would never have been the missionary church of the empire if its saints had spent their time announcing the shortcomings of all other Christians but themselves. Think of Paul writing the thirteenth of Corinthians, and then going out to proclaim to his hearers the "unsoundness" of Priscilla and Aquila, who held a peculiar theory of sanctification, and the scepticism of Apollos, who allegorized the Old Testament.

No; such work as that did not add daily to the Church such as should be saved. It was preaching Jesus Christ, crucified and yet ever living, that builded the great Church which finally conquered the empire. If the facts of life drive any into despair and pessimism let them keep still about it. It is not a thing to go preaching to other people. The world wants good news—not despair, not mud-throwing, not tales of woe about the general apostacy of the human race. That will save nobody. It will only make them ask why God ever made such a wretched old world—with no outlook except to be consumed like a briar patch.

At least, if any are forced into this dark view let them not attack the sunny, joyous souls who believe in God, who see truth progressing, who work in faith and hope, and who are looking for the triumph of Him who is, through His saints, slowly putting all things under His feet. One such courageous soul counts more than an army of despairing Christians, and the time will come when the message of despair, the method of complaint and attack, will be seen in its true light.

WORKING TOGETHER.

"TOGETHER" is the great word of our time. The moment anybody gets an idea he brings people together to organize for working it out. Long ago everybody who owned or controlled any oil got together and organized a single company. We have the "united steel," the "united leather," the "united tin," the "united hemp," and so on through a long list. One man discovers "wireless telegraphy," and immediately a group of men get "together" to work it out and make it practical. Working men get together in the hope of protecting their interests. The Mohonk Conference brings together judges, teachers, ministers, statesmen, business men, lawyers and even soldiers to work out plans for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. All over the country this summer, schools are being held for persons to get together on various lines of religious and intellectual matters. Nobody now expects anything of importance to be done until people get together upon it and unite to push it along.

Is there not something for us to learn from this universal emphasis of "together"? Go to some little struggling meeting and ask why the meeting is running down, and you will generally discover that the spirit of working together is either feeble or dead. We are too often like little children who won't "play" if they can't have their way. "I won't play; I'm going home. See if I don't!" This attitude always ends the sport and spoils the party. The same attitude breaks up a meeting and ends the growth of a church. The mighty fact about the Apostolic Church was that all were together—"of one accord in one place." No wonder the Holy Ghost came upon them. No wonder that they added to their membership by the thousand. The same thing would happen again to-day under those conditions. Let the discouraged members of any little meeting in this wide country get together and decide to work together with God and with each other to build up their church and it can be done. But see what usually happens. Some want to keep the old meeting-house where it always has been, a mile or two out of the town. Others want to have it in the town where people live, and neither group is willing to yield. Part want a pulpit and part want "high seats" of the old sort, and the very life of the church gets wrecked on some such "stone of offense." It reminds one of the people in "Gulliver's Travels," who split up into two parties over the question which was the right end of an egg to cut open when you eat it. There were those who favored the big end—they were called "big-endians"; and then there were the "little-endians," and the whole people were bitterly divided over this momentous subject! It is a true picture. We are so slow in our attainment of the great injunction, "Be of one heart and one mind." Does any neighborhood want to see a transformation this summer? Let them get together and it will come!

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

QUAKERISM AND THE SCHOLAR.

BY WILLIAM WISTAR COMFORT.

The dangers of the student's life are peculiar and inevitable. I say the dangers, for though they exist, they may be survived. These dangers are frequently insisted upon; yet it may be worth while to recall them at this time. Perhaps the primary danger, the danger which besets us most quickly in our relation to those about us, is that of selfishness. Selfishness not on a grand scale, for the true scholar is generous and broadminded toward the appeal of truth from whencesoever it may come; but selfishness on a small, petty, mean scale, which shows itself in self-absorption and forgetfulness of the rights and pleasures of others. One does not like to be disturbed while engaged in a congenial research; one chafes under the daily duties of a material existence when his thoughts are wandering upon some fascinating plane of intellectual activity. How we have hated ourselves afterwards, when a hasty word or an act of assistance grudgingly rendered has betrayed our frailty, our subjection to the petty foibles of humanity, we who feel forsooth so free to soar in the pure ether of intellectual speculation!

A sense of the all-too-likely incompatibility of the scholar's life with the life of society certainly accounts for the mediæval dividing line between the world and the scholar. The latter felt with good reason that he had no business with a family or with any social impediments. And he retired to a cell where he might be alone with God and his books. But this avowed and open withdrawal from society on the part of the scholar is too cowardly an action to harmonize with the requirements of modern social responsibility. No one can live to himself alone, even if it were right for him to try to do so. Thus, in our day, the most absorbed scholar, the most zealous student, assumes a host of duties toward others which he but poorly executes, all because he is too mindful of self, and too regardless of the rights of others.

Is, then, our position so despairing? Are we inevitably bound by the shackles of our profession? Is there no remedy for this wretched self-centralization,—no enfranchisement from the merciless tyranny of a too congenial self-satisfaction? There certainly is such a remedy which will go far to save us, a remedy of a purely human and practical character. I think the remedy lies in the practice of what the Apostle to the Gentiles called charity, a broad, yet definite love of humanity. This conception is not altogether the private property of Christendom. I apprehend that many a generous-minded pagan knew this interest in his fellow mortals. But the passionate yearning for the welfare of others is properly a Christian sentiment, a sentiment which has taken on an unprecedented development and importance in our own times. We who are teachers are especially well placed to feel this sentiment and to give it free play in our daily work. A teacher who has no sense of responsibility for the welfare of the minds and hearts of those committed to his charge makes but a poor botch of his possibilities. So true is this that in most of our private schools you will find teachers are chosen rather with a view to their character and personal influence than on account of their intellectual attainments. It is quite right it should be so, provided that under the head of influence there be included an insistence upon a high grade of execution of the task imposed. Any slipshod methods of instruction are but partially compensated for by the influence of a Christian character outside the class room. No one is quicker than a bright student to detect weakness of intellect or imperfection of preparation in his teacher. Just criticism of our methods as teachers will form a stumbling block to our influence as guides and friends.

To put the excellent counteracting influence of charity upon a broader plane, I mean that as scholars we should never think of ourselves as belonging to a fraternity apart from the common responsibilities of modern society. Our very enviable relation to the youth of this country should forbid us to enclose our treasure, whatever it is, in a tightly-sealed vase. The sharing of our benefits with others becomes an imperative duty. But let us see to it that our activity and our sympathies are not confined even within the borders of our school or college. Our communities stand in need of our help in politics, in charitable organizations, in religious manifestations, in all the activities of society where intellectual leadership is required. Though it may seem temporarily detrimental to extreme forms of individual scholarship, let us be thankful that the heads of our great American educational institutions are one and all taking the lead in a thousand movements that will make of our country a fairer land. Often at great personal sacrifice the leaders of our intellectual world are crossing the country in all directions to assist with their personal advice in undertakings of vast import to our national welfare. In a smaller measure, as the opportunity offers, we, as educators, should always feel a sympathetic interest in all good works. If we do so, it will prove a powerful check upon the besetting sin of selfishness which lies ever in wait, with seductive proposals, to wreck the higher purposes of our God-given existence.

But, needless to say, in the course of these remarks upon that personal selfishness, which, after all, is the common inheritance of mortals, I have been thinking of a vastly more serious obstacle to our best interests which assails us as scholars. I refer to the very real temptations of the scholar to dispense with the forms of public worship. You probably know what is the case, that an extraordinary number of men in our universities and colleges, brought up in a religious atmosphere, have ceased to join with the people in worshipping God. I take it, however, that a very small portion of these men would claim to have reached such a point of self-sufficiency as to be able to dispense with all religious belief of any kind. No, they are not unbelievers. They are respectful, God-fearing men, fully alive to their moral and social responsibilities, profoundly true to their convictions of what is right. But they are men, endowed with powerful and fearless intellects, who are accustomed to think for themselves, at the dictates of no one. Such men are extremely wary of accepting any formulated doctrine, and still more unwilling to assist at any religious rites with which they feel no sympathy. Above all else, they are true to themselves, and shun the idea of becoming a party to any action with which they have not entire unity. I have known such men in several countries, but in our own universities they may be met by the hundred. They are not noisy. They interfere with no one's practices; but conversation with them reveals their distrust of religious emotion, their lack of sympathy with what are called high church forms.

Now it seems to me that this attitude of mind is altogether comprehensible, given the sort of men who are its victims. The Roman Catholic Church, by a series of evolutions, adapted its forms and in part its creed, to the intelligence of the illiterate masses in the middle ages. The balance between symbol and reality is so nicely maintained in the worship of the Roman Church that even a good Catholic is embarrassed to explain where one ceases and the other remains. If we remember that most of the Protestant sects, and especially the Episcopal Church, are simply less extreme forms of the symbolic, one-man system of worship, we can understand why a man of the twentieth century finds himself hampered in expressing his worship in twelfth century phraseology. A great deal of water has flowed through the mill since the mediæval church councils undertook to decide upon a universal creed and form of worship. A man who knows what Jesus' practice was, and who has twenty centuries of Christian knowledge within his head, is apt to feel his heart repulsed by the service of many of our churches. Such a man is generally above all characterized by his honesty, his sincerity. The expression of his worship by proxy strikes him as being a sham. He wants a genuine worship into which he can fully enter, or none at all. He is in addition apt to be highly cultivated, with æsthetic and artistic tastes, hence quick to criticise any service which is not perfectly executed. How often such a man can be heard to exclaim against those services to which people of fashion in our cities flock once a week. The comparatively small amount of spiritual nutriment contained in these spectacular services revolts him and drives him back to his own study and meditation. For, after all, is there not something uplifting, something ennobling, in this constant personal search for some new manifestation of the truth, whether it be in the written word or in the handiwork of nature? Is it any wonder that many a scientist, many a student of the world's best books, finds more virile nutriment, more spiritual aid at his laboratory table, or on his library shelves, than he does in the perfunctory services of a minister whose superior in intellect he well knows himself to be? If you ask such a man what his attitude is toward his family church, he will likely say: "I used to go, but the choir has run down hill very much, and they have got a young man there now about whom the ladies are very enthusiastic, but he is not my style." Or perchance he blames his coolness on some poor old rector, whose inspiration has run out long since, and who has got in the habit of dispensing this same spiritual nourishment week by week to a congregation whose demands are not very exacting.

To sum it up, we should find that the majority of professional men who stay from public worship do so, not because they have lost their faith and have no sympathy with worship, but because they feel sincerely that it is a waste of time for them to go to the church which they once attended regularly. They are often busy men, used to counting the minutes, and they are unwilling to spend a couple of hours at a service from which they can only return to find fault.

If I have ventured to speak at some length of this class of persons, it is because I know a goodly number who belong to it, and because I feel that they have much reason on their side. The class is already a very numerous one in our city communities, and will surely become more so, as higher education develops and becomes more generally diffused. There is just one consideration which is an encouraging fact, and which is in line with what I said about the remedy for selfishness being found in a constant solicitude for the welfare of those committed to our charge. It is this: presidents, deans and in general those instructors who come most intimately into touch with the student body as counselors and as friends, are almost without exception found to be in their seats at public worship. I believe they are thus found faithful, not in order that they may give a decent example to those who look up to them, but because they sincerely believe in the availing help of public worship in the development of the young Christian character. Their attitude on this matter suggests, what I take to be the truth, that a more personal contact with one's students goes far to warm that coolness toward public worship which is so apt to develop in the individual scholar who tries to live to himself alone.

If I have chosen to touch upon this phenomenon in the intellectual life of our day, it is because it has seemed to me for some time that as Friends there is a very great opportunity for our beliefs and practices to appeal to this class of intellectually-estranged Christians. It is certain that neither high church terms nor revival methods will stir them. They are impervious to any of the externals of religion. It must be the appeal of simplicity and of genuineness that is to touch them. The simplicity of our creed, the sincerity of our worship is in itself a great charm to men who want for themselves the genuine expression of religion, or nothing at all. In an ideal Friends' meeting there is very little for the most cultivated mind to criticise, if only the throb of spiritual life is communicated to all present. We are all aware of the truth that in a Friends' meeting, each one present is blessed in proportion to his surrender of self to the leadings of the divine Spirit. In plainer terms, our spiritual profits depend upon the spiritual contribution that we have put into this hour of worship. Nevertheless, it is undeniable that the first time a stranger visits a Friends' meeting, he feels himself to be a spectator, waiting to be led by the spoken word. This attitude continues until by frequent attendance he has penetrated the spirit in which the meeting is held, and is himself penetrated by it. In the matter of vocal expression, our members have a great advantage. The stranger at once feels, upon seeing a Friend arise, that here is no professional speaker upon religious topics, but a simple citizen in the commonwealth of faith. Hostile criticism is paralyzed. No forms, no dress, no phraseology sets the speaker apart from the listener. The ministry is unpaid, sincere, voluntary, and though often crude, yet it is heartfelt.

The Friends' meeting is a form of worship which may be well adapted to the poor and humble of spirit whose faith is their main asset. But I believe that if Friends allow the light of their fundamental principles to shine forth in blameless lives, that their meetings will attract in the future considerable numbers of just that class of highly-educated men who crave simplicity and sincerity. Our personal devotion to uprightness and truth in the daily walk of life will count for much in extending the influence of our society over those who own to no other influence. But an intelligent, God-inspired ministry will be necessary to satisfy the unexpressed yearnings of those who from afar are looking for an occasion to worship in spirit and in truth. We are told that God seeketh such to worship Him. And who is more able to render such acceptable worship than the man who has made the highest use of the intellectual talents bestowed upon him and then turns towards their Giver with a child-like desire to share with the still better and more ineffable joys of spiritual communion? Every mature man knows that his own philosophy will not comfort him in the storm and stress of life's crises. Such men, in spite of their stand-off attitude, are ready to join in a service which jars upon no personal prejudice, and which rings true to their souls. Let us as Friends remember our duty to such as have been described in this paper, and see to it that our Quakerism reposes upon the essentials, not upon the idiosyncrasies, and that it expresses itself in terms intelligible to the modern world of thought. Our simplicity and our modesty will then be something more than an end in themselves. They will be a guarantee of our great-mindedness.

ELEMENTS AND VIRTUES THAT MAKE FOR PEACE.*

BY WAYNE MAC VEAGH.

There are many elements which ought greatly to encourage us in prosecuting our labors in the cause of peace. I cannot myself have anything but absolute faith in its final and not very distant triumph; and that for the simple reason, if for no other, that this is God's world, and his laws discouraging war and encouraging peace will ultimately prevail in it. Those laws, making as they always do for righteousness, are indeed even now winning their way, in spite of all obstacles, far more rapidly than was to be expected; for we should never forget that the divine order for the education of the world moves but slowly along its appointed course; but it does move, and always forward. Let us hope that forward movement will soon embrace many who now thoughtlessly allow themselves to support the idea that the needless killing of men is not, after all, very objectionable.

During the short period of a single year the whole face of European politics has been changed from a warlike to a peaceful attitude by the numerous treaties of friendship and arbitration concluded between great nations, and especially by the important treaties between France and England and between France and Italy; while South America has furnished a practical lesson in the reduction of armaments and a confident reliance upon friendly methods of settling whatever international controversies may arise. What Argentina and Chile have so auspiciously begun is sure to be soon followed by the other South American republics; and it will be a curious commentary upon our boasted superiority in Christian civilization if those South American communities put us to open shame by recognizing that peace is nobler than war and that international friendship is a better safeguard of international honor than a great navy, before the country of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln has had the moral courage to act upon such self-evident truths.

In any event we may rest assured that a discontent with wars of aggression and conquest against the weak by the strong, and with their frightful cost alike in blood and treasure, is growing in intensity every day, leading to different manifestations in different countries, it is true, but having one common source, an ever-increasing reverence for the moral law. The command, "Thou shalt not steal," is at last being recognized as binding upon nations as well as individuals; and before long the like command, "Thou shalt do no murder," will be recognized as equally binding upon all nations as well as upon all men. The very stars in their courses, my friends, are fighting for the cause these commandments enforce, and its final triumph is as sure as that this solid earth endures. While, therefore, we are only seeking to secure obedience to the laws God has proclaimed for the peaceful progress of all His children, we can well afford to labor and to wait in a cheerful temper and in the confident hope which welcomes all favorable signs and is proof against all discouragement.

In addition to cheerfulness, we need also to cultivate the kindred virtue of charity. It does not follow that men mean to do evil because their works are evil. You recollect that Motley declares that even the appalling bigotry of Philip the Second was sincere, and that he really believed that he was gaining heaven by making a hell on earth; and while Lord Acton is quite right in insisting that no man and no cause must be allowed to escape the undying penalty which history has the power to inflict on wrong, there is no reason whatever why we should fail to accord to those who differ from us the same sincerity we claim for ourselves. It is indeed quite possible, for instance, that the advocates of war may in sincerity believe themselves to be Christians, while really advocating the tenets of Mohammedanism, which very properly, as it is the exact opposite of Christianity, owed its progress and establishment to the sword.

There is another virtue for us to cherish—the courage of our convictions. We ought to be cheerful, we ought to be charitable, but we must also be brave—brave and free. The question is this: Shall we continue to waste the taxes wrung from labor in preparation for wars of aggression? Congress now presents the unwelcome spectacle of devoting a far greater portion of its time to considerations affecting war directly or indirectly, than to any one of the serious and threatening domestic problems which confront the country and demand solution.

It is not at all necessary to believe them guilty of wilful misconduct in acting as they do, nor are they much more to be blamed for doing so than is the general public for acquiescence in such conduct. I do not, however, in the least undervalue the difficulties of courageous action in such matters. It is so much pleasanter to swim with the stream than against it, so much pleasanter to be in the majority than the minority. As loyal, devoted, patriotic Americans, we owe it to the memory of our fathers and to the free institutions they bequeathed us, not to fail to discharge our duties in these respects. We ought on every proper occasion, individually, if necessary, to serve notice on President and Congress alike that we will not longer submit in silence to an entire perversion of the principles for which the Revolution took place and of the aims and purposes for which our government was founded. For a hundred and twenty years the Republic prospered beyond any poet's dream. It was then a "world power" in the true sense, because it represented to all nations the strength and glory of liberty and peace.

Surely even the most militant person cannot doubt that our present army and navy are more than ample for our defense, as no country in the world is in the least danger of provoking a war with us. It is therefore not unreasonable to ask that the preparations for wars which can never happen, except by our own fault, should cease, and that we should devote ourselves again to our true mission, that of commending by our example free institutions to other nations; and if we have any surplus treasure let us expend it in lightening the expenses and the burdens of those whose days are given to toil and into whose lives enters far too little of brightness and joy.

Above all, we must demand that every controversy in which our country becomes involved must be peaceably settled either by agreement with our adversary or by some form of honorable and impartial arbitration. Even if the controversy is with one of the great powers, though great powers now very seldom go to war with each other, we must insist upon this course; but if the controversy is with a small country incapable of asserting its rights in arms against us, and it is chiefly against such that great nations now wage war—it is far more necessary for our honor and our dignity not to use our superior strength to refuse our adversary an appeal to a disinterested tribunal, for such a refusal would be a confession of wrong done to a country incapable of punishing us for committing it, than which nothing could be baser.

One of the consolations of the closing years of life is a sense of fellowship not so much with the spirit of the age as with the spirit of the ages; and in that fellowship we may cherish an unshaken faith that in spite of all abatements

"The world out of night Rolls into light."

It may move slowly, but it does move, and in the right direction, for we are learning nobler standards of life, more elevating conceptions of heroism, and more inspiring ideals of civic duty; while we are also learning that the only true patriotism is rooted in reverence for the moral law.

THIRD QUARTER.

LESSON I.

SEVENTH MONTH 3, 1904.

THE KINGDOM DIVIDED.

1 Kings 12: 12-20.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.—Prov. 16: 18.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 27.—Counsel rejected. 1 Kings 12: 1-11.
Third-day, Sixth mo. 28.—Kingdom divided. 1 Kings 12: 12-20.
Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 29.—Idolatry established. 1 Kings 12: 21-33.
Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 30.—The event foretold. 1 Kings 11: 28-40.
Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 1.—Despising counsel. Prov. 15: 1-14.
Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 2.—Refusing to hear.—Zech. 7: 8-14.
First-day, Seventh mo. 3.—Pride and destruction. Prov. 16: 16-38.

Time.—About 937 B. C., according to the modern chronology in Hastings' Bible Dictionary.

Place.—Shechem, between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, about twenty-five miles north of Jerusalem.

Persons.—Rehoboam, the son of Solomon. His age is uncertain, some putting it at 21, others at 41. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who was the chief man or leader among the northern tribes. The Books of the Kings are, as the name suggests, a history of the kings of Israel, and the period covered is from the accession of Solomon to the Babylonian captivity. The two books were originally one. The period covered is about 400 years, so it will be seen at once the history can cover only certain short epochs, leaving the briefest summaries for the rest. When the books were written is not known, but it was probably before 556 B.C., and not earlier than 562 B.C. The author is anonymous, but he names some of his sources, as the Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings 11: 41); chronicles of the kings of Judah (1 Kings 14: 29, etc.); and the chronicles of the kings of Israel (1 Kings 14: 19, etc.). In Chronicles we have another account of the same period, but it contains some striking differences and additions.

Parallel Account.—2 Chron. 10: 1-15.

The lessons of the quarter begin with the period immediately succeeding the death of Solomon. The latter appears to have had but one legitimate son, for we hear of Rehoboam only. From the first verse of chapter 12 it would appear that all Israel acknowledged Rehoboam as the rightful heir to the throne, but there was a strong feeling among the people that the character of the government should be changed. Verses 1-12 should be read. The lesson narrates what happened.

12. "Jeroboam." He had offended Solomon and had fled to Egypt. (1 Kings 11: 25-40.) "Had appointed." (See verse 5.)

13. The king probably thought that he could put down a rebellion as easily as his father Solomon.

14. "After the counsel of the young men." (See verses 10, 11.) He took the advice of those who had little experience. (See also verses 6, 7.) "My father chastised you with whips." This language is primarily metaphorical, but there is little doubt that the whip was used under Solomon to force men to work. "Scorpions." This may mean a kind of lash on which were fixed metal points; it may also be used metaphorically to express his intention to make them suffer more than his father had caused them to suffer.

15. The meaning is that "the course of events had been shaped by Solomon's transgression, and they were left by God to work out their natural results." "Which the Lord spake," etc. (1 Kings 11: 11, 31.) This whole passage is a difficult one to explain with entire satisfaction. It was God's desire that the nation should remain united and serve Him, but He did not force His wish on the people; they could have done as He wished had they chosen; they did not choose, and the result was division and ruin for the northern kingdom, and captivity for Judah.

16. "What portion have we?" Compare 2 Sam. 20: 1. They felt their allegiance was no longer due to Rehoboam. "To your tents." Equivalent to "To your homes"—it is no longer worth while to remain. "See to thine own house, David." As if to say, Judah and Benjamin are alone left to thee.

17. "The children of Israel which dwelt in the cities of Judah," etc. Those members of the ten northern tribes who had settled in Judah remained there and did not join Jeroboam, but gave allegiance to Rehoboam.

18. "Adoram." Probably the same as Adoniram (1 Kings 4: 6), who had charge of the forced labor of Solomon, and was therefore a very unwise selection, as he would be hated by all. "Stoned him." This was a common way of putting to death. (Ex. 8: 26; 1 Sam. 30: 6.) "To Jerusalem." He was at Shechem. He now realized his position and possibly his mistake.

19. "Unto this day." The time when this account was written. The words also show that the kingdom of Israel was in existence when Kings was composed.

20. "All Israel." The northern tribes. "Made him king." Before he had been simply an adviser. He was a man of experience and power. "The tribe of Judah only." Part of Benjamin was included. See next verse. Compare 1 Kings 11: 32.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The lesson is a wonderful example of the importance of making a wise choice.

2. To each one comes opportunities for doing right or wrong; they must be met and accepted or rejected, usually at the moment, or on short notice.

3. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much."

No one is tempted from without, but from within. It is not circumstances that tempt you, but desire; not matter, but mind. And so the conquest of temptation is not the conquest of things, but of thought.—Amos R. Wells.

The most I can do for my friend is simply to be his friend. I have no wealth to bestow upon him. If he knows that I am happy in loving him he will want no other reward. Is not friendship divine in this?—Thoreau.

TOPIC FOR SEVENTH MONTH THIRD.

WAYS OF CONSECRATING OURSELVES TO OUR COUNTRY.

Rom. 13: 1-7; 1 Pet. 2: 13-17.

Second-day, Sixth mo. 27. By more prayer. Ps. 122: 6-9.

Third-day, Sixth mo. 28.—By more love. Ps. 137: 1-6.

Fourth-day, Sixth mo. 29.—By denouncing wrongs. Isa. 62: 1-7.

Fifth-day, Sixth mo. 30.—By building waste places. Isa. 58: 9-12.

Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 1.—By a hopeful spirit. Isa. 66: 8-13.

Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 2.—Our country Christ's. 1 Cor. 15: 24-28.

When the war with Spain began, a wave of martial patriotism swept over the country, and thousands of young men volunteered to follow their country's flag to the field of battle. Far-reaching political corruption has been shown to exist in some of our States and cities, and only a few are roused to combat it. Yet as between the Spaniard or any other foreign power, with all its armaments and the corruptionist in domestic government, certainly the latter is the source of the greater peril to America.

The opportunity of the corruptionist is found in the indifference of the better classes, if we can call any class better that neglects the duties of citizenship, though it preaches and even practices the most scrupulous honesty in those matters that it chooses to occupy itself with. Doubtless it costs to attend political gatherings and work intelligently for the furthering of right causes, involving a sacrifice of time and convenience and perhaps of a form of self-esteem that leads some men to shun the local politician. But the end in view is one of prime importance, and if the associations are disagreeable or immoral, there is all the more reason why the clean and upright should take a hand and themselves become the controlling influence.

Christ's teaching is emphatic and full as to our duty toward God, and what He said as to civil obligation is set on the same basis of absolute duty, enforced by His commandment, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." To fulfill this law we must study to know the needs of our community—good laws, good enforcement of laws, encouragement for officials who seek honestly to do their duty—and then when the needs are known there must come the actual devotion of such measure of time and strength as we can give for the accomplishment of the desired object.

This is consecration—the giving of ourselves for steadfast, remedial and constructive effort, and not a mere fault-finding nor a holding of ourselves aloof. The ministry of the man or woman who is actuated by the spirit of Christ extends wherever there is need, and we can but believe that He would have the powers of darkness under the ban not only of society as represented in the Church, but also of society as represented in government.

"Difficulties are God's way of leading us to rely on his almighty sufficiency."

Educational.

EARLHAM COLLEGE.

With the forty-fifth annual commencement of Earlham College, which occurred Sixth month 8th, the college completed one of the most successful years of its history. The Senior Class numbered forty-four, twelve receiving the degree of Bachelor of Science and thirty-two the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon Anna May Pemberton for advanced study in history. President Kelly delivered the baccalaureate sermon. President Garrison, of Butler College, delivered the annual address before the Christian Associations, and President Charles W. Dabney, of the University of Tennessee, delivered the commencement address.

The Summer School has opened with the largest enrollment for a number of years.

The prospects for the year 1904-05 are very encouraging. Many students are applying for rooms, and the scope of collegiate work will be enlarged.

A number of improvements on buildings and grounds will be made during the summer.

HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

Bachelor degrees in arts or science were conferred upon twenty-nine graduates of Haverford College, at commencement, Sixth month 10th. The degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon three post-graduate students—Takeo Arishima, A.B., Imperial Agricultural College, Sapporo, Japan; William C. Longstreth, A.B., Haverford College; H. Edwin McGrew, S.B., S.M., Penn College.

Many advantages that pertain to the smaller colleges were pointed out in the address delivered by President Sharpless, who maintained that Haverford is teaching her 130 students with the most expensive faculty list, in proportion to the number of students, of any college in the United States. The influences looking toward the development of intellect and character resulting from close association of strong men in the faculty with responsive students have been so potent in many, he said, that the college is satisfied no mistake has been made in not lowering its standards for the sake of big classes.

Barrett Wendell, Professor of English Literature in Harvard, delivered the oration. His topic was "Education." The heart of his message was:

"No education can serve much practical purpose in training men for the perplexing diversities of life unless it bases itself on the training, throughout the flexible period of youth, of that faculty of voluntary attention which only in maturity should be suffered to range among the matters of its choice or of its incidental duty."

Fellowships in Haverford were awarded as follows: The Clementine Cope fellowship ($500) for 1904-1905—William P. Bonbright; two teaching fellowships ($300 each) for 1904-1905—Carlos N. Sheldon and William M. Wills.

COMMENCEMENT AT FRIENDS' UNIVERSITY.

The week commencing Fifth-day, Fifth month 26th, was a busy one for the students of Friends' University, Wichita, Kansas. It was the beginning of commencement week. The first event of the occasion was a recital given by Estella Nicholson, of the School of Elocution. All the readings were chosen from the popular little book, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," by Alice Hegan Rice, and were highly appreciated.

On Sixth-day evening the public listened to a piano recital by Eva Blue, of the School of Music, which spoke well for the work of that department.

On Seventh-day evening came the annual oratorical contest. This year there were six contestants. Two prizes were given, a $10 and a $5 prize. Hazel Howes, '06, won first prize in an oration on Lord Shaftesbury, "England's Greatest Philanthropist," and Laura Peterson, '05, won second prize, her subject being, "Sacrifice as a Social Factor."

First-day morning, the regular baccalaureate sermon was preached by Charles A. Berger, of Burlingame, Kansas. He spoke on the power that moves the world to God and toward success, choosing for his text 1 Tim. 4: 12: "Let no man despise thy youth." His words were forcible, and of the kind that could be of practical help to the band of young men and women about to make their commencement in this world of struggle.

Second-day evening the three literary societies of the college—the Davis Lyceum, the Forum and the Brightonian Literary Society—gave a joint program, which consisted of original stories and poems, which, together with readings and music, showed the helpful work being done in the societies along these lines.

Third-day evening the School of Fine Arts gave a recital. Edith Davis and Gertrude Becker, both of Lawrence, Kansas, have in charge respectively the piano department, and the elocution and voice. The selections that made up the program showed real artistic interpretation.

Fourth-day morning came the commencement exercises of the Preparatory School, and orations were given by each of the seven graduates. In the afternoon a fete was held in the gymnasium. It consisted of club swinging, ball drills, wand drill and pole braiding. This work is new this year, but the fete showed how much can be done in a short time when real energy is put into it. In the evening George Winans, ex-State Superintendent of Public Instruction, addressed the normal graduating class in a speech full of excellent practical advice to young teachers.

Fifth-day morning, the great day of the occasion, saw Russell Hall gay in pink and brown, the colors of the class of 1904. Over the rostrum, which was banked with palms, hung the class motto: "Faber suæ fortunæ," and the nine graduates in their caps and gowns looked as if they were each of them a capable "maker of his own fortune." Charles F. Scott, Congressman-at-large for Kansas, made the address of the morning. "Next to Christianity, education is the greatest cause in the world," he said, and then he went on to make a plea, not for brain work, but for the cultivation of a sound heart. His speech was eloquent and earnest, and he brought to his audience rich gifts of thought. Adelbert Andrew, of Endora, Kansas, won the Haverford scholarship which is given each year. Each graduate received the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and also a State teacher's certificate.

This ended the exercises for the week. Good music had been furnished by the Ladies' Glee Club of Friends' University, also the Friends' University Orchestra, and by a number of soloists from the city.

At every event Russell Hall was filled with interested friends. The large crowds spoke of growing interest in the school. Friends' University is improving every year, and the unoccupied parts of the mammoth building are being finished and equipped for larger work. Like all the institutions in which the Society of Friends has become interested, it is permanent and sure to hold its own in the world of competition.

A special meeting of Bible School superintendents is called for 2 o'clock p.m. on First-day, the 26th instant.

At the public meeting, at 2 o'clock, Second-day, the 27th instant, J. M. Lowden, a delegate to the Jerusalem Conference, will give an account of the "Jerusalem Cruise" and what it means to the Bible School cause.

Very truly,

Sixth month 13th, 1904.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

The trustees of Kansas City Meeting, whose meeting house was destroyed by fire on Third month 23d last, have at length succeeded in securing a permanent location. They have purchased, on very favorable terms, the building formerly owned and occupied by the Southside Christian Church, at the southeast corner of Thirty-first and Charlotte Streets. The terms of sale allow the Southside Christian Church the joint use of the building until the 1st of Twelfth month, while they are building at another location. Until that date the Friends' Meeting is to be held at 3.30 p.m. First-day, the Sabbath School at 2.30 p.m. and the Christian Endeavor at 9 p.m. on Third-day. Friends are asked to note this address and attend these services when in Kansas City at these hours.

We suffered quite a loss by the fire. The building being only partially damaged, we could only collect a part of our insurance, while the damage was of such a nature that we could not use a portion of the building left standing, and when we came to dispose of it were only able to obtain $50 over the cost of removing it. Should any Friends feel like assisting us in securing our new church home, we will be glad to have them do so. Subscriptions can be sent to our treasurer, Edgar B. Alberson, 316 American Bank Building, Kansas City, Mo. Yours truly,

FRANCIS A. WRIGHT,

President of Trustees.

Dear Friend:—The call was so large from readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND for my Indian seed that I was obliged to send only enough for two to four bills to each—sufficient, I trust, to give all a start. Right here I would say, in answer to many inquiries as to how Indians can be had earlier and further north, to simply make a frame six to ten inches square and two inches high, and cover with thin, oiled sheeting. This keeps off cold winds and holds the warmth that comes, as it should, from a good supply of fresh manure, under the hill. In danger of late spring frosts, cover frame with heavy material. Cucumbers, squashes, etc., can be forced ahead in the same way. Take off frames when warm showers come. This frame covering keeps off bugs, worms, etc., and should be kept on till frame is full of vines. Another good way is to set a large glass dish or jar over the plants.

And here I will give another suggestion for growing lettuce, beets, onions, etc., early and with but little trouble. Fill an old pan, punctured in bottom with a few small holes, with rich earth, in which sow seed thickly a week or two before spring opens. Put in a box a small lamp, and set pan on top of box, or partly fill an old pan with water and set in this water smaller pans filled with earth with seed therein, and put over lamp. Seed may be sown very thickly and as soon as ground opens transplant on a damp day, and all will grow and come in early. Transplanting is not nearly so tedious as thinning and weeding out rows that have been sown out doors.

For years the "latch string has been out" at my home to a great number of traveling ministers, companions and Friends, and they have ever been welcome guests. Most of these have passed over to the other side, but the memory of such is a delightful fragrance to me, and especially that of old "family sittings" in my father's and my own home. Now, while I cannot enter the homes of Friends personally, I wish to send all who desire to grow them a reminder of "an old Friend minister," in the shape of a few cuttings of the beautiful and fragrant Haleana honeysuckle, of which I have an abundance, that my old visitors used to admire so enthusiastically, as they covered our verandahs and filled our rooms with fragrance.

The cuttings easily root in sand kept damp and imbedded all but the top eye. Simply send stamps for packing in moss and oiled paper and to pay postage.

I have been a great sufferer for months past with a very painful eye, and fear I shall lose the sight of it.

Sincerely,

ALEX. M. PURDY.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

London Yearly Meeting statistics for the year show a gain of 81 in membership.

Albert J. Bailey has been at Monkton Ridge, Vt., for a while in acceptable service.

Walter S. Aldrich visited Ferrisburg, Vt., en route for New England Yearly Meeting.

Fred J. Cope, of Columbus, O., is doing excellent service in the limits of New York Yearly Meeting.

Seneca H. Stevens, who has served as pastor at Brookfield, N. Y., will attend New England Yearly Meeting.

Clara L. Groves, former pastor at Monkton Ridge, Vt., was recently married to George Stanley, and will reside in Michigan.

The 12th instant Alfred Cornell opened meetings in High-land Mills, N. Y., as arranged for by the yearly meeting superintendent.

Nellie C. Chapin, the faithful pastor at Westmoreland, N. Y., was called suddenly home to Ceylon, O., because of the illness of her mother.

The Westfield Quarterly Meeting missionary meeting convened at Horton, Ind., on the 12th instant with an interesting program. It was well attended.

Interested Friends are asked to contribute to the special fund to put a minister at Collins, N. Y. W. C. Taber, treasurer, 173 Chambers Street, N. Y., will receipt for all funds received.

Elmer D. Gildersleeve, the faithful resident minister at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary as a minister the 19th of this month. He has for many years been chairman of the Gospel Service Committee, and also the Evangelistic and Church Extension Committee of New York Yearly Meeting.

Friends' Quarterly Meeting, held the 4th instant at Westfield, Ind., was largely attended. The crowd on Sabbath morning more than filled the meeting house. Peter W. Raidabaugh, Thomas C. Brown and William P. Haworth were the visiting ministers, and their services were most acceptable. The funeral services of Bert. Clark, a beloved young Friend, were conducted at 3 p.m.

"An Hour with Francis, Our Junior," a pamphlet previously mentioned in these items, is published by the Junior Christian Endeavor Society of Friends' University, and copies can be secured by sending to Myra B. Binford, Wichita, Kan.

Spiceand Quarterly Meeting, Indiana, held the 10th to 12th instant, was favored with the presence of Luke Woodard, Thomas Newlin, John and Levi Pennington, Jared P. Binford and others. Leanah Hobson returned her approval of service from New York Yearly Meeting.

Fifth month 20th, the Cuban Independence Day, was observed by the Christian Endeavorers of Gibara, Cuba, by visiting the homes of the poor, sick and aged, among whom they distributed about $8, a fund raised by personal gifts and contributions solicited from interested acquaintances.

The meeting at Westfield, Ind., is experiencing a loss in the removal of Reuben P. Cox, a valued elder, who, with his family, are leaving for a temporary sojourn in North Carolina, thence going to Oklahoma to settle. He has sold his fine farm to Stephen H. Cox, who, with his wife, Mary Nichols Cox, will soon take possession.

Ellen M. Buell visited the meeting at Poplar, Ind., the 12th instant and preached. Poplar is at present under the care of a committee. George Symons, one of the committee, was acceptably in attendance, emphasizing in his remarks the line of instruction presented in the sermon. The same evening Ellen M. Buell visited the meeting at Sheridan, Ind.

Sylvester Jones, of Gibara, and Charles Haworth, of Holguin, Cuba, recently made a trip to the country, holding a meeting at a village named Yariyal, in the home of a former member of the meeting in Holguin. Although very rainy, about thirty were present, and good interest was manifested. Sylvester Jones continued his journey to the home of Noah K. Williams, where also a meeting was held. All were anxious for another meeting.

Mary White, sent by Iowa Yearly Meeting as a missionary to Jamaicaica, after years of success on her return to her home now at Whittier, Cal., stopped at Knightstown, Ind., and on Sabbath, the 12th instant, attended Friends' Meeting. She preached an excellent sermon at the morning service, and lectured in the evening. At the close of the exercises $41 was subscribed for the Temperance Committee, and $10 for the Committee on Peace.

The missionaries of the Friends in Cuba, although constantly in contact with people accustomed to ritualism and formalism in its extremest form, are not ashamed of the spiritual doctrines of Friends, or, rather, of the Bible, and from time to time are encouraged and strengthened in their own faith by the appreciation shown by their congregations of the simple, pure gospel. A lesson on baptism given recently by Charles Haworth to the candidates' class and others in Holguin was given close attention and was received with appreciation.

John M. Watson has been laboring in Curwensville Monthly Meeting, Pennsylvania. He began work there Fifth month 30th. In his usual energetic manner he visited families and was a chosen channel through which a message of helpfulness was carried to each member of the several home circles he entered. First-day morning he spoke earnestly at the regular meeting, urging that all make the throne of grace their constant resort. He also held an appointed meeting First-day evening, the 12th instant, when he showed the real apostolic love for soul-saving.

School closed at Vermilion Academy, Vermilion Grove, Ill., Sixth month 10th. The attendance this year was the smallest for a number of years. There were eight graduates in the senior class. Dr. Miner, of the Illinois State University, delivered the class address, which was very instructive and much appreciated by all. Professor Frank H. Clark, now of North-branch, Kan., has been secured for principal of the academy for next year, and there will be a strong effort put forth to increase the attendance to what it has been, or even greater than in former years.

Emporia Monthly Meeting was held Sixth month 10th, 1904, and was well attended. A large amount of business was transacted in brotherly love. The spiritual life of the meeting in all of its branches is good, including the Fifth-day evening prayer meeting, Christian Endeavor and cottage prayer meeting, conducted by the young men and young women of the meeting, all of which have been seasons of great blessing. The monthly meeting, as well as our Evangelistic and Pastoral Committee, have shown their appreciation of the earnest zeal and faithful labors of their pastor, Asher Mott, by giving him a unanimous call to remain another year, which he has accepted.

The 12th inst. was observed as Children's Day at Millbrook, N. Y. An interesting program was carried out. The services of J. L. Spicer, the superintendent of evangelistic work, were very helpful.

Whittier Quarterly Meeting, California, held the 21st ult., was largely attended, it being the last quarterly meeting before the yearly meeting. There was a good attendance of fraternal delegates from Pasadena Quarter. Lindley Wells preached on Seventh-day, and Professor C. E. Tebbetts on First-day. Tilman Hobson, J. H. Douglas, Harry Keates, Levi D. Barr and Amos Cook were also in attendance. The Christian Endeavor held a very enjoyable meeting First-day evening. The exercises were in the hands of the Intermediates, and "Tobacco and Alcohol" was the theme. The new officers were elected—George Taylor, president; Maud Moon, secretary.

Thomas Clark, of Richmond, Ind., who graduated at Haverford in 1858, and came on to attend the commencement and alumni exercises, spent a few days visiting friends and relatives in and about Philadelphia. Several of his classmates, and a number of the older men who were in college at the same time, were glad to welcome him back to the college after an absence of nearly fifty years. When he was there the only buildings were Founders' Hall and the Observatory. He attended meeting at Germantown on the 5th inst.; Twelfth Street Meeting, the 9th inst., and Haverford Meeting, the 12th, and had acceptable service in all three places.

About three years ago some of the missionaries at Gibara, Cuba, made their first visit to the home of Floridiano Perez, whom they found a poor, despairing invalid, bed-ridden for two years from inflammatory rheumatism, shut up in a small, close room, without light or fresh air; lying on a hard cot, without a bath since the beginning of his sickness; a wife, three children and an aged mother dependent on him or he on them. He was indeed a pitiable spectacle. Since then he has been the recipient of frequent visits and attentions from the missionaries, church members and Endeavorers. A great change has been wrought in him and in his surroundings. Now he may be seen on Sabbath, still bed-ridden, but in a light, airy room, clean, with clean bedding, with a happy face beaming with the love of Christ, superintending a Sabbath School which meets each week in his home.

The "British Friend" has this item on "American Epistles" in London Yearly Meeting: "The chief business of the first two sittings was the reading of epistles from Dublin and from the thirteen American yearly meetings with which we correspond. Most of these speak of the benefits of the Uniform Discipline and of the Five Years Meeting, which has now the adherence of nearly all. Several alluded also to progress in Education, and nearly all to the death of Harriet Green. The only jarring note was struck in the epistle from Ohio, which manifested a harsh and exclusive spirit, as well as much crudity of thought in regard to the investigation of the Scriptures. A college was to be started that should be free from theological error. Herbert Sefton Jones took strong exception to the intolerant spirit of this epistle."

Stephen and Eliza Stubbs, members of Emporia Monthly Meeting, Kansas, met at their home in Emporia with their children and grandchildren, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage on the 8th instant. Their son-in-law, Elam Henderson, a minister, and wife, from West Falmouth, Mass.; also Alma Swift, a missionary, who, with her husband, are laboring under the auspices of Iowa Yearly Meeting in Jamaica, were among the guests. After a few weeks' visit at home, these Friends will return again to their fields of labor. Elam Henderson occupied the time in the morning meeting at Emporia on Sixth month 12th, and was much favored with words of life, freighted with encouragement. In the evening Alma Swift gave a very interesting discourse on the missionary work in Jamaica, where she has labored for ten years, alluding to the habits and customs of the people, the three distinct races and the prejudices, superstitions and home life on the island, and the many things a missionary must expect to meet, together with an account of how the Lord has blessed their labors and the spread of the gospel in Jamaica.

Marion Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight was held at Marion, Ind., the 10th instant, with the usual attendance and no visiting ministers present. By adjournment, the quarterly meeting proper, on Seventh-day, was held at Sycamore, Howard County, Ind. "Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might," was used as a basis for the exercises in the worshipful part of the meeting. The speakers were unanimous in the thought that strength and power were given to the Church for a purpose. Some ministers from neighboring quarterly meetings were present. The attendance of the meeting was not large. Phariba Stevens, secretary of the Missionary Board of our yearly meeting, was present and gave a talk on "Mission Work in Mexico," after which $50 was raised for the work. After a talk by Mary E. Baldwin on the subject of "Peace," over $12 was raised to aid the cause. J. O. Binford, yearly meeting superintendent, remained at Sycamore over the Sabbath and preached morning and evening. A monthly meeting at Milo, thirteen miles northeast of Marion was asked for, and a committee was appointed to visit the Friends there.

About Third month 20th, Friends of Everett, Washington and those desiring to become Friends, started a mission. After organizing a Bible School and Christian Endeavor Society and holding meetings for about six weeks, Charles N. Replogle was invited to come from Cowen, Ind., and help in the work. Meetings opened Fifth month 15th in a tent, seating about 250 people. For two weeks the work continued, with services each afternoon and night, and three services on Sabbath Day. On the 2d inst. a new monthly meeting was set up to be known as Everett Monthly Meeting. Its membership includes twenty-one new members and seventeen who were Friends before, making a total of thirty-eight members in all and more are expected to join. Frank Younger was appointed clerk; Katherine Younger, treasurer. There is a great future in store for Friends in Washington. Any Friends going to Washington will do well to write to George W. Harvey, 2220 Rockefeller Avenue, Everett, Wash.

Signor Giacomo Boni, the archæologist who is directing the excavations of the forum at Rome, has found a heavy capstan with eight fixed levers of wood.
The wood is perfectly preserved, while the iron fixtures have become oxidized.
This discovery is considered of the greatest importance as being the first known mechanical contrivance dating back 2,000 years. The capstan, which was found almost intact, has a diameter of over two yards.

FOOD FACTS.

What an M.D. Learned.

A prominent physician of Rome, Ga., went through a food experience which he makes public:

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food, and also know from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients that the food is a wonderful re-builder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion, and sick patients always gain just as I did in strength and weight very rapidly.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely, and go to the mountains of this State, but two months there did not improve me; in fact, I was not quite so well as when I left home. My food absolutely refused to sustain me, and it became plain that I must change; then I began to use Grape-Nuts food, and in two weeks I could walk a mile without the least fatigue, and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers I consider it a duty to make these facts public." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

number who have left Syria in the past eight years is reckoned at 140,000, and would have been greater but for the difficulty in obtaining passports. The eagerness to get to Egypt is due partly to the security and fairness of English government, and partly to Egypt's new era of prosperity.

Attorney-General Knox has informed the President that he will retire from the Cabinet as soon as Governor Pennypacker issues his commission as United States Senator from Pennsylvania. The President will name William H. Moody, present Secretary of the Navy, to succeed him, and politicians are speculating as to who will become Secretary of the Navy.

Twenty of the leading ministers of Chambersburg, Pa., Protestant and Catholic, have signed the following agreement: "Recognizing the very great danger threatening American family life and the total disregard of Christian morals involved in the indiscriminate practice of divorce, and the hopeless nature of present laws on the subject to furnish any relief or protection, we hereby pledge and declare that we will not marry any divorced person so long as the other party to the divorce is still living."

The fact that our government has up to the present time wholly ignored the desire of Colombia that the question of the privilege of interpretation of the treaty of 1846, and of our government's responsibility under it, should be submitted to an impartial arbitrator, has received far too little attention. That our government is liable for damages if our conduct at the time of the Panama revolution was in violation of the treaty, is clear, even though the reason of the revolution cannot now be undone. Time cannot take away this liability.

The burning of the excursion steamer,
General Slocum, which occurred the 15th inst., on the East River, New York, is too horrible for words. Even the Iroquois Theatre disaster was not more appalling and sudden. Women were roasted to death in sight of their husbands and children, and babies by the score perished in the water, into which they had been thrown by their frenzied mothers. Up to date 674 are reported missing. President Roosevelt has ordered a rigid investigation of the disaster. Secretary Cortelyou will personally conduct the inquiry in behalf of the Federal Government.

The Executive Committee of the Interchurch Conference on Marriage and Divorce has recently issued its first general address to the public. This takes the form of an appeal to the Christian public for a fuller realization of the sanctity of marriage, and aims to prepare the way for more definite action in the future. Statistics are quoted for 1903, showing the proportion of divorces to marriages in eight States as follows: In Maine, 1 to 6; in New Hampshire, 1 to 8.3; in Vermont, 1 to 10; in Massachusetts, 1 to 16; in Rhode Island, 1 to 8; in Ohio, 1 to 8.8; in Indiana, 1 to 7.6; in Michigan, 1 to 11.
These States show "a rapid and steady increase in divorces during the decade," and this condition the committee believes to be true of the country at large.

SCENIC GLORIES OF THE LAND OF THE SKY AND SAPPHIRE COUNTRY.

Much has been written concerning the superb scenery of this unrivaled plateau; much more might still be written, and its glories would even then be far in advance of the most glowing description.
From the moment the traveler enters this region until duty elsewhere forces him to leave it, naught that is unpleas-ing meets his eye. With a soil of unsurpassed fertility its verdure is of the deepest and most beautiful hue; its rolling hills enchantingly hem in its placid lakes, its broad rivers and its rippling streams, while its strikingly picturesque and lofty mountains—famed alike for their number and their size—form the background for innumerable scenes of natural beauty and grandeur. Any one of its massive peaks, placed elsewhere, would be an object of striking beauty.
Here, surrounded by scores of others equally grand, its majesty is comparatively.

The "glorious climate" of other places is often descanted upon by writers portraying the attractions of favorite resorts. That of Western North Carolina really deserves this appellation more truly than many much higher vaunted localities. At no season of the year is there ever the slightest discomfort, either from summer's heat or winter's chill. And for the reason that both of these features are entirely absent, summer is a season of "ethereal mildness"—winter a period of coolness and comfort, either pleasant and agreeable to invalid and full of attractiveness to the healthy and vigorous. The claims of perfection for the climate of this region are strong but they do not lack for the best and strongest corroboration. The official government records of the climate of Western North Carolina, which are unimpeachable evidence, give the following averages: Spring, 53.49 deg. F.; summer, 70.72 deg. F.; autumn, 53.48 deg.
F.; winter, 38.87 deg. F.; with a mean for the whole year of 54.15 deg. F., and a mean relative humidity of but 65 per cent. The "Land of the Sky" and Sapphire Country is reached from Philadelphia in through Pullman Sleeping cars via Southern Railway. For descriptive matter regarding this charming country call on or address Charles L.
Hopkins, District Passenger Agent, 828

PENN MUTUAL LIFE

921-3-5 Chestnut Street, Phila.

The official statement of the Russian losses in the war, prior to the middle of Sixth month, is reported as follows: Navy, 964 killed and 242 men wounded; army, 1,016 killed and 2,183 men wounded, making a total of 4,405 killed and wounded; 716 men had been taken prisoners.

Governor Peabody has declared martial law in San Miguel County, Col., at an end. He has directed the release of the troops from duty, and instructed Captain B. Wells to turn over to the civil authorities, President Charles Moyer, president of the Western Confederation of Miners.

The attempt to secure a sane Fourth of July in Chicago has failed for lack of sufficient financial support. The "Chicago Amusement Association," which proposed to show the small boy how to enjoy himself without going to the hospital for repairs, needed $50,000 for this purpose, but less than one-tenth of that sum has been subscribed.

We may choose to stay away from God, but we cannot choose the consequences.—Dorcas M. Tinker.

Every finer instinct needs to reach upward to the Sun of Righteousness through quiet thought. Then should we resolutely so order our lives that the days should not fly past in a ceaseless whirl which our minds leap to follow, but they would hold breathing spaces for the soul.—Harriet Ware Hall.

COFFEE CATARRH

An Unsuspected Cause.

It is curious how many diseases come from a disordered nervous system which locates disease in some part of the body, and the primary cause can often be traced to coffee which first breaks down the nervous system. A Georgian says:

"There is no doubt coffee gave me nasal catarrh. The ceptim in my nose was all gone and the catarrh was eating its way, getting hold of the main bone of the nose. It also affected my sight very much.

"My nose was constantly dripping bloody water, but in two weeks time after I quit coffee, and used Postum Food Coffee in its place, I could see my way very well, the dripping from my nose stopped and my nose finally got perfectly well and healthy as far as is possible for the ceptim to grow back.

"There is no doubt it was a case of coffee catarrh, and the cure was made entirely by changing from coffee to Postum. The rest of my family took up the new drink and Postum relieved my wife and little boy of frequent headaches, and what is called 'coffee headache' is not known in our family any more. Our sleep is so much more refreshing.

"We have influenced many people to try Postum, and all of them like it better the longer they use it, and most of them say it is better than coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days trial Postum in place of coffee often works wonders. There's a reason.

LIGHT TO THE BLIND.

Everything has its wonders, even darkness and silence, and I learn whatever state I may be in therein to be content. Sometimes, it is true, a sense of isolation infolds me like a cold mist as I sit alone and wait at life's shut gate. Beyond, there is light and music and sweet companionship; but I may not enter. Fate silent, pitiless, bars the way. Fain would I question his imperious decree, for my heart is still undisciplined and passionate; but my tongue will not utter the bitter, futile words that rise to my lips and they fall back into my heart like unshed tears. Silence sits immense upon my soul. Then comes hope with a smile and whispers, "There is joy in self-forgetfulness." So I try to make the light in others' eyes my sun, the music in others' ears my symphony, the smile on others' lips my happiness.

BECOMING LIKE LITTLE CHILDREN.

AMONG the conditions of entrance to the kingdom of heaven which Christ lays down is this: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven." Now, to understand this saying, one must understand the three stages in the life of a person. The first stage is one of unconsciousness, of absolute dependence on others for everything which furthers life. We are made dependent. We are taken care of. Our very bodies are formed in such a way that they adjust themselves to the environment without any conscious direction. A bright light makes the lid close to guard the eye. The presence of the source of food makes the lips do their part toward feeding the tiny body. Intricate and complicated actions are performed with no more idea of an end in view than the locomotive has when it starts for Pittsburg. All the earliest operations and acquisitions are learned by blind obedience to external stimulus. The child simply submits to the great forces which work upon him, and this implicit submission constructs his life. His whole part in the drama of life at this stage is to let the powers outside himself have their way with him unhindered.

But each seemingly blind action awakens consciousness just a little. Every movement, however instinctive, produces a slight contribution to the little fellow's sense of his own power. He rapidly begins to get a will of his own, and conscious purposes appear. He resists on occasion now, and asserts himself against the combined powers of the world. In very loud tones he reads off his declaration of independence. He is no longer unconscious and blindly obedient. He has discovered himself and has decided to be some sort of an independent person. The things he learns now he learns by conscious effort. He thinks of himself in all he does. He must watch his hands whenever he is gaining any new skill. He is slow and bungling. His constant foe is self-consciousness. He does nothing very well because he can never lose himself.

But there comes a new and higher stage. Actions which had been performed by slow and painful effort become natural and easy. The stroke, the touch, the act becomes sure, graceful, skillful. It no longer requires direct control of will or guard of thought. The actor now forgets himself. He does the right thing the right way without thinking. Consciousness sets the goal or end, and then sub-conscious powers, trained to do it, take up the action and carry it through with almost perfect precision. We have passed from unconsciousness, through self-consciousness, to a new and remarkable kind of unconsciousness. The person at this final stage corresponds with his environment with the same accuracy and precision which marked the blind instinct of the child, but this has been gained by a process of effort which has mastered the self and turned it over, no longer blind, but still obedient, to the great demands of the universe upon it.

But what has all this to do with the kingdom of God? Just this: A man must get not only beyond that first stage of blind instinct, but also beyond the second stage in which righteousness is full of self-consciousness, and in which goodness is the result of hard and painful effort. Good deeds are all spoiled and bungled at this stage because the trail of the self lies over them all, and if one does not hold himself by sheer effort to his duty, he may slide off any minute into some path of natural instinct. Now we see that "becoming like a little child" is very different from "being a little child." It is life in our third stage, in which the action has become natural and unconscious, but only because the powers of the person have been mastered by conscious effort and made responsive, by an act of the will, to the calls that are made upon them. The goodness Christ seeks is no calculating goodness, no goodness through which you can hear all the machinery of the self creak. It is a goodness which has been formed by conscious obedience to Him until it becomes this self-forgetful, spontaneous goodness which bursts forth by a kind of second nature, and is as unstudied and as unconscious of results to self as the child's instinct. Acts and deeds of love now sprout out and flourish as naturally as once the selfish ones did. Such a man doing the good deed is almost surprised to hear it praised. His only answer is, "How otherwise?"

THE HAVERFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

WE regret that we cannot give our readers an adequate account of this school of religious history which came to an end at the close of last week. Ten days packed full of lectures and discussions and conferences and Bible classes and meetings can hardly be reported so as to give the reader much idea of what happened. There were from one hundred to two hundred present at the regular morning and evening lectures, and altogether there were about five hundred different persons at the various sessions of the school. The students came from all the Eastern yearly meetings, with the possible exception of Canada. There was a large delegation from New York, and, considering the distance, a goodly number from North Carolina, though naturally the bulk of the members came from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Seven persons from England were in attendance.

The morning opened each day with a Bible class in which the two Corinthian epistles and the latter part of Isaiah were studied. Then followed a meeting for worship. These were times of blessing and help, and a real preparation for the work of the day. One of the most important courses of lectures covered the life of our Saviour, beginning with the social and physical conditions which formed the environment of His earthly life, and going through the events of the immortal story. Many of the lectures dealt with the inward life, the spiritual nature, of man as recent psychology reveals it. Much thought was also given to the structure of society, the organic character of all human life, and to the problems which grow out of the fact that our lives are all tied in together.

"The Heart of the missionary message," the way in which Quakerism may be applied to the needs of to-day, how life itself may be made into a sacrament, what it means to save a life by losing it—these were a few of the rich things which were spread before those who were favored to be members of this summer school.

One of the most novel features of the program was a series of out-of-door conferences on topics connected with our own problems, such as the value of the Queries, the pastoral work of the meeting, methods of conducting business meetings. These conferences were as free and informal as they could be, and proved interesting and valuable occasions.

The two main purposes of the school were: first, the deepening and enlarging of Christian experience and Christian fellowship, and in the second place to give those who could come an insight into the tremendous contributions which study and investigation have made to Christian knowledge and Christian service. Some see already, what some day everybody will see, that it is a woeful blunder for us to allow the non-Christian world to monopolize the fruits and the benefits of intellectual discoveries. If our message is to affect the world and prove mighty to the pulling down of strongholds, it must utilize all the gains which are won. This task can only be imperfectly done in these brief summer schools, but they have a real mission, and this particular one has been a definite help to many.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THREE yearly meetings are going on simultaneously this week—California, beginning on the 22d; New England and Canada, both beginning on the 24th. This is probably the first time in our history that three yearly meetings have occurred together. Sometimes two have overlapped, but even that event seldom occurs. Oregon will, too, immediately follow, beginning on the 5th of next month.

THE Friends' Historical Society has decided to reprint 500 copies of No. 1 of the "Journal," the first edition of which has been exhausted. The first volume of the "Journal" will close with No. 3, so as to begin the new volume evenly with the year. The first supplement to be issued will be the famous manuscripts written in the seventeenth century, on the "First Breaking Forth of Truth." Its appearance will be noted later.

MORE LETTERS FROM JAPAN.

[Few better opportunities to see into the real situation in Japan will be found anywhere than in the letters of Mary Nitobe, daughter of Joseph S. Elkinton, of Philadelphia. We are again permitted to print some passages from recent letters which have been received from her.—Ed.]

Kyoto, Fifth Month 1st.—The enclosed clipping is a facsimile of a letter written in his own blood by one of the soldiers who applied for leave to join one of the bands appointed to accompany the torpedo boat destroyers which have wrought such havoc at Port Arthur. While I write in comes Uncle Ota. He has had word from Count Nambu's regiment that he is fighting daily near the Yalu, that one of his horses was wounded, though he escaped. May he be preserved to the end! The little band of thirty members of the Imperial Guard, with which he is immediately connected, is distinguishing itself.

I realize more and more the horror of the things the Russians did in China. It seemed to me impossible at the time; but the evidence is too strong. An English lady said here, the other day, that terrible as was the sinking of the Petropavlosk, she could but set it over against the 4,000 Chinese driven into the river at the point of the bayonet—men, women and children—at Blagovestchenck. But I do not love to dwell upon any of these horrors. I want it ended quickly.

Kyoto, Fifth Month 12th, 1904.—Events are happening thick and fast. Port Arthur sealed on the 3d. The Yalu crossed on the 2d, and an amazing landing of troops in the Liaotung Peninsula on the 7th. Frightful as was the loss of life in crossing the Yalu, it was two and one-half per cent. of the victorious army, instead of ten per cent., as the Japanese commanders had anticipated. It was also estimated that 5,000 men would be lost in effecting the landing and cutting telegraphic and railway communication above Port Arthur. Thee may well imagine that no such calculations would be made calmly to sacrifice the blood of the nation were it not that this is believed by all to be a struggle for life, not a mere expansion whim.

It is indeed awful beyond words, and I am deeply interested in thy sympathy with a peaceable intervention, that is, mediation on the part of the United States and England; but no mediation can avail now until Port Arthur and Mukden and Harbin are taken. The circumscribing of the sphere of the war is the one thing that will avail, and there I pray from the depths of my heart that the United States may stand firm, and so does every lover of Japan. Surely it is the duty of all of us who believe war wrong to do all we can to hasten the day when its horrors shall cease from the earth.

It has been said that we Westerners cling too strongly to the mere physical life. Certainly that cannot be said of the brave souls which have gone out to meet the death struggle for the land they love. Thee may know how the men on the Kinshu-Maru met death. Friends shot each other. Many threw themselves into the sea, one at least committed hara-kiri, that they might not be taken prisoners. Unfortunately, it was the result of carelessness. A torpedo boat (or destroyer) accompanied the Kinshu-Maru, but the barometer was falling rapidly, and the commanders of the vessels agreed that the Kinshu could go on alone, while the destroyer might avoid the danger of the coming storm. It was a fatal error. The detachment on board the Kinshu-Maru had been reconnoitering in northeastern Korea and was returning with information obtained. They collected and destroyed all the papers which might betray their movements before it was too late.

Fifth Month 14th.—A very interesting "War Number" of the "World's Progress" has come to hand. It is the April number, and in the editorial headed, "The Wonderful Japanese," occurs this paragraph: "There is no more exciting chapter in all modern history than this spirited activity of Japan. That she was building a great navy everybody knew, and everybody knew that she was preparing for the inevitable fight with Russia. Since she was cheated out of the fruits of her victory over China she has not for a moment forgotten her purpose. And, horrible as war is, there was no way in the present stage of civilization for Japan to win the place which she feels she deserves except by fighting. The so-called civilized nations of Europe humiliated her nine years ago, saying in effect that she must be content to keep her rank as a minor power, and as a secondary influence in Asia. She had either to accept this humiliation or sooner or later fight. There is yet, it must be said to the shame of civilization, no way for a smaller power to win the recognition of the great powers, and a fair chance for legitimate development, except by military strength."

Henry Norman says, in the same number: "I hold most strongly that peace in the Far East ought to have been preserved, and might have been. . . . I believe firmly that such an understanding [Russian influence in Manchuria, Japanese in Korea—an open door for the world in both countries] could have been reached by the two nations if England had had a foreign minister as far-sighted, as tenacious as Mr. Hay. . . . He has accomplished in a year what we, with our enormous start in power and prestige, have failed during a dozen years to do: He has secured the commercial integrity of China (except in the German province—that may come later)."

We feel so strongly that the war ought to have been forestalled by England and America, but that anything done at this moment to hamper Japan would be worse than treachery. The time will come again for mediation. May England and America stand true then and justice prevail!

We deeply regret the loss of a torpedo boat—more especially the fourteen lives which were lost in blowing up the mines at Talienwan, and we are anxiously awaiting the awful battle anticipated at Liao-yang. As yet Count Nambu has escaped unscathed; but we know many others as dear and brave have gone. So many sad things come to one's knowledge. A Japanese officer found a Russian officer severely wounded, after the battle on the Yalu, and gave him water from his own canteen. In return the Russian officer asked the Japanese to accept a photograph of his family and offered him his sword. The photograph (taken from the Russian's breast pocket) was accepted. The sword the Japanese would not take, saying it must be the possession of a brave soldier until his death. How contradictory are the conditions of war and many of its incidents.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE JOY OF BELIEF.

BY F. B. MEYER.

When we become regenerate our nature as a whole is left as it was, except the evil influence of self, the pivot around which it used to revolve, is exchanged for one of devotion to God. You must not think that regeneration alters the nature to such an extent that we are no longer able to laugh, to frolic with children, to romp with boys and girls, to take an interest in music, or this lovely world of God's. All our nature is left as quick and susceptible as ever, but the self-principle is crucified and the Christ-principle is enthroned. The whole being has come under new and blessed influence of the love of God. The first question we have to ask about everything is: Has God created this—this love, this friendship, this employment, this method of recreation?

Is this music of God? Is this cheque stamped with His impress? Are these things, to which our soul is attracted, bearing, like coins do, the image and superscription of the King?

Here stands the cup before me. It is chased with exquisite skill; it is brimming, and its color attracts and fascinates me; I put my hand out to receive it; but as I lift it to my lips, can I look into the face of God and thank Him? Is there that in my friendship which enables me to soar; is there that in this delight which startles my heart to join with the anthem of the cherubim; for, if so, I may take this thing with joy and thanksgiving, counting it as innocent.

"It is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer." There are some friendships, fellowships and engagements which incapacitate us for prayer. You cannot turn from that hour which you have spent, and at the close of it say: Let us pray. You cannot come out of that recreation and take your Bible and read your evening passage. This is the third great test. If, then, you realize that God, who knew your nature and made it, gave you, created for you, that joy, and fitted it to you with infinite ingenuity; if you realize that, so far from being hindered, you may turn to the most holy exercises of the closet and read your Bible, and commune with your God, you may look up into the face of God and say: "Thou art the blessed God, the happy God, the God whose life is music, who art light and in whom is no darkness at all; and Thou hast put this beautiful thing into my experience; I cannot thank Thee enough, but I will rejoice and be glad; my heart shall sing for joy, and Thou wilt be glad because I am glad."

There is nothing more exquisite in this world than the joy of little children; to see them quiver with delight, the little faces flush with joy and the eyes sparkle, and to have the child throw itself upon your bosom, crying: I am so happy. And sometimes it seems as though God comes into our life and says: "Little child, do not think I am always using the rod and administering the bitter cup; I must do so sometimes not because I like it; but now, come and have a good time and enjoy yourself to your heart's content."

You sorrowing people, take joy—open your heart to the glinting light. You lonely people, let God put in some gift of His tender thoughtfulness to alleviate the monotony of life. You who have passed through a great bereavement, do not shut yourself up with it, but accept the joys that God creates.

But does not this go too far? How about the coarser pleasures? How about the ball, or the dance, or the theater? But surely it is not possible to pray over the theater, with its excitement and its baleful effect on the lives of the performers. It is not possible to let ourselves go into animal, sensual delight with the texts I have enumerated before our face. No; we can only be glad for things which God has made, things for which we can thank Him, things which do not hurt or ruffle our holiest hours; these alone can come trooping into our heart with music.

Everything which God has made is beautiful. Oh, sorrow, God hath made thee: art thou beautiful! Oh, black, sable night, without star or moon, God hath made thee: art thou beautiful! Oh, terrible ache and pain, that gnaws at the heart and never leaves it for an hour: art thou beautiful! When we look at these things apart from God, they certainly startle, scare and frighten us.

But perhaps we are not child-like enough. I like that story in Kingsley's life. One summer morning he was sitting with a friend in his study, and his little girl came in with a long worm, exclaiming: "Oh, father, look what a lovely worm I have got!" If we could see worms with a child's eye, we should think them beautiful. God is so beautiful in Himself that He cannot make anything which is not beautiful, and if we do not see beauty in things, it is only because our eyes are not opened yet; but some day, when we stand with Him and see things in His light, all the horror and darkness will pass away, and everything which bears His signature will seem beautiful. We may not feel it to be beautiful, we may not see it to be beautiful, but we dare to believe that it is; and finally, in the very presence of God, the scales will fall from our eyes, and we shall see that He hath made everything beautiful in its time.

Do you love God? Do you live back in the heart of Christ? Do you know God? Oh, embosom yourself in Him! Let your life be hidden with Christ in God, and from that standpoint look out upon everything, and you will find that Paradise has come back, and you will hear God say of everything that He has made, "Behold, it is very good."

London, England.

REMINISCENCES OF ELIZABETH FRY.

BY P. M. DARTON.

Prisons and prisoners are now so well and thoughtfully cared for that we are apt to forget how short a time ago a very different state of things existed. We who know the past are not likely to forget that we owe the reform worked all over England to John Howard and Elizabeth Fry, but a later generation may not be acquainted with facts so familiar to us.

I never had the privilege of seeing Elizabeth Fry, but as a child I admired greatly a large engraving which hung in my dear mother's room, and which represented a dignified, matronly lady, with a sweet yet powerful face. The simple lines of the Friends' dress, and the dainty transparency of her cap, made a setting for such marked individuality. Once I remember hearing one maid asking another whose portrait it was, and the one questioned replied, "I don't know her name, but she was a duchess." No doubt the calm dignity of her bearing was responsible for the title. When I inquired of my mother about the "Duchess," I heard very many interesting reminiscences which clothed the picture with life.

Elizabeth Fry, my mother said, was not as tall as the picture seemed to represent, but she had a dignified carriage, which made the "Duchess" a not unnatural title. She moved easily and softly, and had a very sweet smile, was a devoted and wise mother, and so careful of the health of her children that she kept a special room, in which, after her prison visiting, she changed her clothes before visiting her nurseries; but her womanliness alone did not enable her to accomplish the reforms she wished. Elizabeth Fry had a great power over people, and great discernment in choosing her fellow-workers. She could convince her public of the need of reform, make committees zealous, and workers energetic and loyal, and last, but not least, her power for good over prisoners of the worst kind was marvelous.

My mother, as a girl of seventeen, had been clerk of her meeting at Southampton, and Elizabeth Fry used to stay in my grandfather's house when she visited that town. There my mother first met the great prison reformer, and was fired with a desire to help. She remained many years an active member of the Prison Visiting Committee, and when she married and moved to London was put upon the Visiting Committee for Newgate, her special duty being to find situations for women leaving the prison, which would give them a chance of leading good lives.

On one occasion, my mother told me, Elizabeth Fry wished to visit some condemned prisoners who were to be executed the next day, and my mother went with her to Newgate. The governor said the five men to be hung the next day were desperate characters, and he did not think it right for two ladies to go alone to see them; but when they reached the condemned cell, and a warder would have entered with them, Elizabeth Fry declined his attendance courteously, but very firmly. So the door of a dark and dreary room, with one small, high, grated window opened, and closed, leaving the two ladies facing five desperate men—and a locked door behind them. The prisoners at once crowded up and stared insolently at them.

Elizabeth Fry for a moment looked at the men in silence, showing no fear, but a divine pity and sympathy shone from her face, and I doubt not also from my dear mother's. The men fell back and ceased to stare. Then on the strained silence fell the reformer's beautiful voice, resembling truly a "silver bell," soft and clear and musical, full of tender vibrations.

I am sorry I can only remember very briefly what my mother told me of her words, but they began thus:

"My friends, I have been told that you are in great trouble, and I have come to see if I can help you."

The men drew further back, but listened intently and silently; the "silver bell" seemed to have almost magic power. Slowly, calmly and pitifully the tender voice again broke the impressive silence.

"You are not all old. It cannot be so many years since, ignorant of crime, you kneeled perhaps at a good mother's knee at night and begged God to preserve you to another day and forgive your sins." Some of the men hung their heads, and the rare and bitter tears of manhood shone in downcast eyes; one slunk back to a bench, sat down and hid his face in his hands.

"Your mothers may have gone home to the merciful God, to whom they taught you to lisp your first prayers; or perhaps, alas! they may now be praying on earth for you with tears of grief." Here sobs broke the silence, for the speaker had paused.

"Think not that I am come to blame you, or to talk to you of punishment for sin. No! my poor friends, I know not what temptations caused your crimes; I only know that the dear Lord, whom you are so soon to meet, is more merciful than the tenderest mother, and I also know that when He gave His precious life to save us sinners one of His last acts on earth was to pardon a malefactor, and to promise that He would meet that penitent sinner in paradise." By this time the men had one and all fallen on their knees; several were sobbing.

My mother said, though all the words were well chosen, it was the voice and manner and human sympathy of her friend which had such power. Before she left that cell she had talked with each man separately, promised them paper, pen and ink to write to their friends, and had offered to carry messages for them to their people. Then they all said a prayer, and she shook hands with each of the prisoners in turn, leaving a very different set of men from the five wild-eyed ruffians she had met an hour before.

But her good work for them was not over. Again Elizabeth Fry visited the governor, and pointed out very forcibly that five men with a bad past left together, with no sort of employment, were not likely to be the better of one another's company. One of her arguments my mother well remembered was against enforced idleness and solitary confinement, and was thus set before the governor: "You and I are educated, and are what people call 'good' people; yet were we left entirely alone and unoccupied for a long time, could we keep our minds from evil thoughts? And were we criminals, should we be the better for no occupation except talking with worse criminals than ourselves?"

She urged employment for all prisoners, even if they were to die to-morrow; and, as a result of her suggestions, books and writing materials were sent to the five criminals she had just visited, and this was the beginning of rational employments for prisoners, even condemned ones.

This is only one of several accounts my mother gave me of the good and great work done by Elizabeth Fry, whom she loved and revered greatly, and whom it was her privilege and pleasure to help for many years.—"The (London) Friend."

HORN OF PLENTY.—A whiskey manufacturer had among his brands one called the "Horn of Plenty," on which a temperance poet wrote the following lines:

"Plenty of poverty, plenty of pain,
Plenty of sorrow, plenty of shame,
Plenty of broken hearts, hopes doomed and sealed,
Plenty of graves for the potter's field."

GALILEE AND THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

BY EDWARD C. MOORE.

"Go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you."—Mark 16: 7.

GALILEE IN THE LIFE OF JESUS.

What was Galilee in the geography of the spiritual life of Jesus? Galilee was the place of a forlorn village, Nazareth. Nazareth held a carpenter shop. And that carpenter shop and the humble dwelling which belonged to it held Jesus almost thirty years. There was spent all the years of His tender home associations, of His simple schooling, of His golden dreaming, planning, thinking, of the training for the manhood that was yet to move the world.

On those hills He had wandered often, alone or else in company with the few who held Him dear. There He had prayed, been tempted, striven. There He had learned patience and yet patience, in the years after His vision must have come to Him and before His work began. There He had been tempered to fortitude and had won His peace. He had courted the wastes and fastnesses. He had revelled in the glory of God's face of nature and then gone back with eager, loving heart to the trivial business and the squalid haunts of men.

GALILEE IN THE LIFE OF THE DISCIPLES.

Where was Galilee in the geography of the spiritual life of the disciples? There they had been born, all but one of them, and his name was Iscariot. And there they had been born again. No doubt they had desired to get out of Galilee, to go up to Jerusalem—until they had been there. After that they chiefly desired to get away again. In Jerusalem the man whom they loved was hated, the truth they accepted was despised, and at last the Lord whom they adored was crucified between two thieves. To Galilee went back almost all the memory of blessings which they had received. Do you wonder if to Galilee went forward all the hope they dared to cherish that they might be blessed again? I can fancy that they almost wept as they thought of those bare hills and dirty villages and fishy boats again. All the toil they had there undergone was now transfigured and the small relations in which they had been restive were sanctified, for the Lord's sake, the halo of whose presence now hung over all.

There is no more profound and illuminating declaration or one worthier to be put into the mouth of angels, than just this one: Go to Galilee. No trait of the narrative is more suggestive, symbolical, prophetic of the nature and conditions of a renewed and deepened life with Christ in God for you and me. Christ is not always there where men in their half-formed expectations touching the divine assume. He stays not ever on what men would call the heights of His experience. He is not to be found only in such places as Gethsemane. The substance of His revelation is not all to be drawn from the record of those few hours on Calvary.

GALILEE IN OUR LIFE.

Where is Galilee in the geography of your spiritual life and mine?

We picture those men upon the accustomed shores. For a day or two I fancy, or even only for a few hours they may have been idle, wondering in grief: What next? Then that man whose homely common sense had cut many a knot already and would yet cut many more, said: "I go a fishing." And they went. They toiled all night and took nothing. But at dawn the Lord stood upon the shore. What does that mean for you and me?

Galilee is for us that land of simple, homely and familiar experience out of which we may have supposed for a moment that the Lord had lifted us, away from which forever, as may be we fondly thought, He had led us. He had lifted us up to heaven and we feel the shock of being brought back to earth. Heaven those years with the Master must have seemed to the disciples even while they were living in them, heaven still more in the retrospect. And yet to the same old Galilee, yours and mine, it may be quite clear that Christ is now calling us back. It is thither that He bids us go. It is there that He will be found going before us, or else not found. It is there that we shall see Him or else we shall not see.

Galilee is the land of homely duties and of little things. It is the land of the eternal commonplace, we say, of fishy boats and evil-smelling villages, of associations of which we had wearied and of tasks from which we had rejoiced to be set free. The dreariness of it all seems insufferable, the monotony of it a keen pain.

One moment, I beg of you. What was that we were saying? The land of the eternal commonplace? But it was here in this land, by this lake, that we met Jesus. We were actually fishing when we met Him. Surely that event was not commonplace. All the hallowing and glorifying of our life flowed from that meeting. And the most of that hallowed and glorified life with Him whom we had met was lived right here in Galilee. Our most sacred experiences were had here in Galilee. Here light came to us, and God's love dawned upon us—here in Galilee. Here Christ did for us nearly all that He ever did and became to us what He is. Here we have done for others almost all that we have done. We need to be forgiven for our forgetfulness of all the grace shown to us here in Galilee. We will go about the work again as faithfully as we went about it before. What has been may be again. The angels say that it shall be. "There shall ye see him. Lo, I have told you."

Each one of us is bound to make the little circle in which he lives better and happier. Each of us is bound to see that out of that small circle the widest good may flow. Each of us may have fixed in his mind the thought that out of a single household may flow influences that shall stimulate the whole commonwealth and the whole civilized world.—Dean Stanley.

MORNING AND EVENING.

Let us be thankful that in the morning splendor and the evening magnificence we have an act of God which the materialist cannot degrade by any assumption of utility. When the scientist tells us that all the delicate pearly tints of the orchid are a chance product, perpetuated solely because they caught the eye of some wandering bumblebee, we may be silenced, but we are seldom convinced. We prefer to believe that man is greater as well as bigger than a bumblebee, and that a more gaudy wig-wagging would have served the purpose of attracting insects quite as well as this perfection of prismatic hues.

But no "survival of the fittest" can explain the perpetuation of the dawn or the continuation of the sunset—much less their origin. When from some woodsy camp we look out at sunrise upon the placid lake surmounted by its slowly drifting mist of silver, and above the environing forest see the "rosy morn empurple all the sky," we realize that between the morning's first creation and our present hour nothing has stood but God. The most daring doubter has never ventured the hypothesis that all this is continued because it happened to fit in with some material need of bird or beast or man, whose selfish interests made certain its repetition. Darwin confesses that he never had been able to account for the eye in the tail feathers of the peacock. But the morning and the evening are more stupendous facts, their oceans of emerald and islands of vermilion and headlands of amethyst depending upon no "sexual selection" or gustatory satisfaction for their continuance. Doubtless the tanager's scarlet coat is appreciated by his mate, and the grosbeak's throat of rose color is not without its charm for the eye of his soberly-clad companion; but as if to keep distinctively his own the chiefest of his works, God hung high in the vault of heaven forever the morning and the evening, whose "outgoings" he himself has made rejoice (Ps. 65: 8). These supreme splendors are contingent upon no co-operation of the creature. The insect may perpetuate a flower, the man a fruit; but God alone the sky, whose divine perfections are still in as close touch with their Creator as in that primal dawn "when the morning stars sang together and all the suns of God shouted for joy."

Wordsworth, with the spiritual insight which was peculiarly his own, likens childhood to a dawn "trailing clouds of glory." And Browning voices all our better thoughts when he says:

"To me at least was never evening yet
But seemed far beautifuller than its day."

These blest hierophants of God, the morning and the evening, seem designed to teach us that God would have life's dawn and life's sunset pre-eminently enriched. Even the stormiest noon is oft preceded by a dawn that rivals in its jeweled splendor all the visions of St. John, and many a day of cyclonic tempests has closed with a sunset radiance such as might have glowed above the primal home of man in Eden. Childhood and old age are, we may believe, under the special care of heaven.

How lovingly has God provided for life's opening hour. Except for some shadow or hint of sin, what can heaven itself show to us more beautiful than the unfolding of a soul in infancy? How native to the little one is faith, how instinctive love, how sweet its prompt unselfishness! Some years since, one of our American artists gave to the world a picture which greatly moved all onlookers. It was of a fair-haired child kneeling by a patched coverlet spread upon a snow-white couch in a humble attic, the babe with folded palms commending its soul to the safe keeping of God. That is the ideal of life's dawn. So should life rise upon a sin-sick world. So should it come with heaven about it in its infancy. So should it enter even the stormiest existence amid the radiance of a heavenly calm.

But he who gives at evening time, after a day not wholly clear or dark (Zech. 14: 6), an hour of golden glow, gives to his beloved, toward life's close, the heavenliest of benedictions. It may be all right for the few to "die in harness," but that is not the divine conception of a perfect end. The strenuous noon is no more becoming man than the restful eve. It was never God's intention that we should go staggering to our last step and so fall reeling into our graves. Every human labor ought to be laid aside before the darkness falls; and between the daylight and the dark, as the Creator himself in nature teaches us, there should intervene an hour of peace and benediction. Whatever in our lives does not conspire to that is abnormal. It is all right to fight Apollyon on the open plain; but even to the warrior saint there should come, before the river is crossed, one precious hour upon the heights of Beulah, an hour in which the soul may put off its soiled and sweaty garments, and newly clothed in restful robes, refresh itself with visions of the celestial city.

"Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and the evening to rejoice." Perhaps there never was a time when or place where the lesson was more needed than now and here. Let childhood have its play and age its ease. They are of God's ordaining. Labor is holy, but not more so than well-earned rest. Only the slave toils "from sun-up till sun-down." Give life's dawn and its twilight to simple enjoyment of beauty and goodness and faith. For, after all, the lesson the world most needs is that man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.—"The Interior."

There was no bitterness in her poverty; she met, looked at it, often even laughed at it, for it bound all the family together hand in hand; it taught endurance, self-dependence and, best of all lessons, self-renunciation.—Dinah Maria Mulock.

They have committed the unpardonable sin who sin until they reject pardon, spit upon it, make a mock of it, and forget that they have sinned. Every sinner is speeding toward that awful hardness, but he has not reached it while he can bemoan his iniquity.—Amos R. Wells.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

MARLBORO.

BY J. LINDLEY SPICER.

The one hundredth anniversary of Marlboro Monthly Meeting was held at Milton, N. Y., Sixth month 26th, 1904. An interesting program was enjoyed.

In 1789 Friends met in the house of Edward Hallock, a descendant of Peter Hallock, who came into Connecticut in 1640. He was a Friend minister, and Martha Hallock Bell, the present minister at Milton, is of the same sturdy, God-fearing stock. In 1804 seventy acres of land was acquired for meeting-house and burial purposes. In 1828 the Hicksites retained this property, and in 1830 the Orthodox built another meeting-house. In 1886 the present modern house was erected upon a new site. The old meeting house is now standing, but is used as a dwelling. The scenery about the place is picturesque. Aside from the great natural beauty of the mountains, glens, lakes and fruit farms there is the "Ravine Falls," a bridal veil like stream falling two hundred and twenty-five feet. The place was named "Marlboro" for John Churchill, Duke of Marlboro, who was born in 1650 and died in 1722.

The personnel of the meeting is quite interesting. Howard P. Fry and Stephen Taber were members of this meeting. They traveled much in the ministry, and were greatly beloved. Joseph Carpenter settled here in 1766. The Carpenter family trace their family from Wales in 1550. Upon the shore of the Hudson is a rock inscribed "E. Hallock, 1760." This is called "Forefathers' Rock." Philadelphia Masters was the first white child born in Philadelphia, and she was the great-great-grandmother of Nathaniel Hallock. The Smiths of this community were formerly called the "Bullsmiths," from an old tradition that one of the first settlers on Long Island acquired a tract of land—"as much as he could ride around in a day upon a bull's back." The Smiths show cannon balls picked up near the site of the old house of Anneke Smith.

It is said that in 1777, when a British ship had dropped down the river and anchored off Milton, or Marlboro, after the burning of Kingston, an eccentric old hunter, known as "Crooked Leg Jackson," crept down in the bushes and from his old long flintlock gun he sent a ball through the cabin of the vessel, disturbing a game of cards. The irate officers rushed out, but seeing no person, and nothing but the inoffensive house in sight, they ordered some shots fired at the house. The gunners were not as expert as were Admiral Dewey's at Manila, and the house was unharmed.

Some skirmishing took place about here, and an old chronicle mentions "Bloody Pond," where parts of human remains protruded their ghastliness out of the water.

In the library at Newburgh, N. Y., there is a penciled foot-note in a history of Marlboro which states that a "Dubois" acquired three thousand acres of land from a man named "Quirk," giving in payment a "jug of rum." This tract lay upon both sides of "Oldt Man's Creek." The love of "rum" still exists in that beautiful section, and many a mighty one has been laid low since Quirk "wet his whistle" at such a cost.

Slaves were kept. They were registered at the county clerk's office, to aid in recognizing them if they ran off, and were recaptured. One was designated as having "a square notch or ha'penny on the left ear." Vagrants were sold to the lowest bidder, to be maintained for one year, or until some one would underbid them.

LESSON II.

SEVENTH MONTH 10, 1904.

JEROBOAM'S IDOLATRY.

1 Kings 12: 25-33.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Keep yourselves from idols.—1 John 5: 26.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Seventh mo. 4.—Jeroboam's idolatry. 1 Kings 12: 25-33.

Third-day, Seventh mo. 5.—A just judgment. 1 Kings 13: 1-6.

Fourth-day, Seventh mo. 6.—God's judgments. 1 Kings 14: 1-20.

Fifth-day, Seventh mo. 7.—Idolatry forbidden. Ex. 20: 1-6.

Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 8.—A jealous God. Deut. 4: 14-24.

Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 9.—Folly of idolatry. Psa: 115: 1-11.

First-day, Seventh mo. 10.—Punishment of idolaters. Hosea 8: 1-8.

Time.—Jeroboam reigned, according to the revised chronology, 937-915 B.C.

Place.—First Shechem, and afterwards Tirzah, a few miles north of Shechem, in a beautiful country. Compare Cant. 6: 4.

Persons.—Jeroboam. He married an Egyptian princess. His son's name was Abijah.

Contemporaries.—Rezin, king of Damascus; Shishak, the Pharaoh or king of Egypt; Rehoboam, and his successor, Abijah, in Judah.

Important Event.—The official introduction of idolatry into the northern kingdom.

The lesson takes up the history of the northern kingdom.

25. "Built." He strengthened it and fortified it and made it fit for a royal capital. "Mount Ephraim." Better, as in Revised Version, "The hill country of Ephraim. "Dwelt therein." Afterward he went to Tirzah. (1 Kings 14: 17, etc.) "Went out." He set his workmen to strengthen and build Peniel. The site of this place is not known, but it was east of the Jordan, near the Jabbok (Gen. 33: 31ff). It was fortified to protect the kingdom from attacks by Assyria and Judah.

26. "Said in his heart." He reviewed the condition of his kingdom and saw that it was satisfactory, except in one respect—that of religion. Possibly the recurrence of the feasts may have suggested this to his mind.

27. "If this people go up to offer sacrifices," etc. From this verse it would seem that it was already a custom to go to Jerusalem to make sacrifices. Jeroboam reasoned that the influences of Jerusalem would be sufficient to steal away the hearts of his subjects. Whether Jeroboam's reasoning was correct for his time, it is impossible to say, but it would hardly be so now. Religious union nowadays does not mean political union. Jeroboam, however, wished an excuse, and he did not believe God's promise to him (1 Kings 11: 38).

28. "Took counsel." Probably with some of the chief men of his kingdom. "Made two calves of gold." These probably of considerable size, more that of young bulls than what we call calves. The origin of these idols is obscure. It is hardly likely that they came from the Egyptian worship, for in Egypt it was the living animal that was worshiped. The more probable explanation is that the ox was a semitic emblem and was known to the Hebrews through the Canaanites. It would be natural for Jeroboam to take some familiar object and adopt it. "Of gold." Not solid, but a wooden center overlaid with gold. "It is too much for you." The marginal reading, "Ye need no longer go up," is clearer. It was as much as to say, "Ye have chosen a new king, choose a new worship." "Behold thy gods," etc. Compare Ex. 32: 4, 8. Jeroboam practically said this new worship is the same as that which your fathers had in the wilderness. He appears to have forgotten, or not to have known, the disastrous ending of Aaron's experiment.

29. "He set the one in Bethel, and the other put he in Dan." Bethel was one of the sacred sites in Palestine (Gen. 12: 8; 28: 11-19; Judg. 20: 18; 1 Sam. 7: 16; Judg. 4: 5). It was about ten miles north of Jerusalem, and so was in the extreme southern part of Jeroboam's kingdom. Dan was in the most northern part (Gen. 14: 14). Thus he practically said these two places were as good places at which to offer sacrifices as Jerusalem; they were also much more convenient and safe. They had been associated with religious worship before, which doubtless influenced him.

30. "This thing became a sin." Because it broke the second commandment, and also the first. Beside this, it permanently divided the kingdom; it led the people into fixed idolatry, with all its accompanying sins. "Even unto Dan." Why Bethel is not included is not clear. It is very likely that part of the verse has been lost.

31. "He made houses of high places." Revised Version. That is, one at Dan and one at Bethel, at the high places. "And made priests from among all the people." Revised Version. Heretofore all priests were chosen from the tribe of Levi. It is likely that Rehoboam would have been glad enough to have had Levites, but they refused (2 Chron. 11: 13-15).

32. "Ordained a feast," etc. This was in the Eighth month (Nov.), whereas the Feast of Tabernacles was in the Seventh month. "Went up unto the altar." Like Solomon, he himself inaugurated the new order of things.

33. "Devised of his own heart." It was altogether a personal and human institution. The idea of the writer is to bring out this fact strongly.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "The sin of which Jeroboam was guilty was the sin of worldly policy." "He trusted in policy, not in the Living God."

2. Jeroboam's argument was the specious one—the end justifies the means.

TOPIC FOR SEVENTH MONTH TENTH.

SOME MODERN IDOLS AND HOW TO OVERTHROW THEM.

Luke 12: 15-21; Phil. 3: 17-19.

Second-day, Seventh mo. 4.—The law against idols. Ex. 20: 4, 6, 23.

Third-day, Seventh mo. 5.—Weakness of idols. Jer. 10: 11-15.

Fourth-day, Seventh mo. 6.—Superstitions that last. Acts 17: 22-29.

Fifth-day, Seventh mo. 7.—Wedded to our idols. Hos. 4: 16, 17.

Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 8.—Idols oppose Christ. Acts 14: 11-18.

Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 9.—Destroying our idols. Gen. 35: 1-5.

Perhaps the great American temptation is to worship success. Success justifies a multitude of sins in the eyes of all too many of the sinner's fellowmen; but be he millionaire or successful politician, no measure of success can compensate a man for any departure from the law of right, and the transgressor will know full well some day the unanswerableness of that awful question, "What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Social recognition is the chief fetich of many a young man, and probably more young women; and that, no less than greed of gain, can crowd Christ from His place and leave the aspirant with that multitude that has "done two evils—forsaking the fountain of living waters, and digging for themselves broken cisterns that will hold no water."

The nation is no more immune from the law of condemnation and loss for its sins than is the individual. Righteousness alone exalteth, and for nations as for men the lust of wealth and power may usurp the throne, but no blood money of sinful traffic and no broad domain unfairly won can build again the broken walls and bulwarks.

Idolatry contains within itself the principles of self-destruction. Jeremiah declares it when he says, "Every goldsmith is put to shame by his graven image." But it is the purpose of God in Christ to save men from their own folly, and that largely by us, His followers. It is because people so easily forget the corruption or the oppression that built up the prosperous citizen of to-day that the temptation has its force. If we could only rightly present Christ, these false gods would fall before Him, like Dagon in the presence of the ark of the covenant. What we think and believe is in part what the community thinks and believes, and the measure of success as the many see it is the measure of popular esteem. Measured by the line and plummet that we know, the idols will be found wanting. The surest destruction is a supplanting, whether it be for ourselves or others; for where Christ has His rightful place the idol finds no room.

REPRESENTATIVE MEETING IN TOKIO.

Rumors had been in the air for some time that arrangements were being made to hold a meeting, in Tokio, of religionists composed of representatives from the three religions in Japan—Shintoism, Buddhism and Christianity—the object of which would be to discuss the relation of the Russo-Japanese war to religion. This meeting, unique in itself, the first of its kind, to be so much as thought of in Japan, was held in a commodious hall in Tokio on the afternoon of Second-day, Fifth month 16th.

The Japanese government has in various ways thoughtfully taken pains to make it known to the public that the object of the war is for the safety of the empire and the peace of the East. This carefulness on its part has seemed necessary lest some misguided or malicious persons—native and foreign—should think that, as Japan is a so-called non-Christian land, and Russia a recognized Christian nation, this is a war of heathenism, or Buddhism, or what-not, against Christianity. On both sides of the struggle this idea has been ventilated, and if unchecked it might lead to much harm in Japan to Christian propagandism, especially that form of it held by the Greek Church, and might also endanger the lives and property of Christians. On the other hand, it would be likely to create a prejudicial sentiment against Japan in the West amongst those nations whose good esteem, at present, she has and which she most highly prizes. On the eastern side, with such persons, it is "If we fight Russia, we must antagonize Russia's religion," or, on the part of ill-informed and irresponsible representatives of other religions, "Now is the opportunity for us to strike a deadly blow at Christianity." On the western side a similar spirit of antagonism operates against Japan under the guise of "The Yellow Peril," a falsehood which seeks to make it appear that Japan is disqualified by race and religion from attaining to western standards of morality and religion and consequently will eventually come forward as the leader of Asiatic races and the opponent of Christianity to conquer the Christian nations of Europe and the world.

It was, therefore, a circumstance fraught with much significance that representatives from the several religions were able to meet on a common ground and amicably discuss the subject. Each person admitted was given a small bow and pin as a token that he was entitled to be present. The hall soon filled to overflowing, and the gates were ordered to be closed to prevent overcrowding.

Shintoists, Buddhists and Christians addressed the meeting, and also the governor, and mayor of Tokio. There was no discordant note heard among them as relating to the important subject which had brought them together. Kodo Kozaki, ex-president of the Doshisha, was one of the Christian speakers. The foreigners were represented by Dr. Imbrie, of the Meiji Gakuin (Presbyterian Theological Seminary).

One point strongly emphasized by Dr. Imbrie was the freedom of religious belief granted to the people by the Constitution. He said, in substance: "It is very easy for us to profess that the present war has no connection with the subject of religion, but if asked to prove our assertion, what reply could we give? For answer, I would refer to the Constitution. One article of the Constitution given to the nation by the Emperor grants religious freedom. That Constitution is inviolable. It must stand forever. If the government is waging a war against or in the interest of a religion it is trampling under foot the Constitution. That it cannot do. This fact is of itself sufficient proof that the war has not for its object an attack upon any religion."

All representatives present were requested to secure as wide a circulation amongst their own people as possible of the following resolution which was adopted at the meeting:

"Resolution adopted at a meeting of representatives of all religions in Japan, held at the Chukon Shido Kaikwan, Tokio, on the 16th day of Fifth month, 27th year of Meiji (Fifth month 16th, 1904):

"The war now existing between Japan and Russia has for its object, on the part of Japan, the security of the empire and the permanent peace of the East. It is carried on in the interest of justice, humanity and the civilization of the world. With differences between races or religions it has nothing whatever to do. We, therefore, meeting together without distinction of race or religion, agree that we will endeavor to publish to the world, each in a manner accordant with the methods observed in the religious body to which he belongs, the real purpose of the present war as now described. We also express a most earnest desire for the speedy accomplishment of an honorable peace."

DIGNITY OF A HUMAN SOUL.

BY A. T. PEARSON.

One of the grandest conceptions ever put before the human soul is the idea of eternal life. It is much more than immortality, which is by no means synonymous with eternal life. Eternal life has no beginning, and it has no end. If you love God and serve Him, you shall partake of the eternal past of His being as well as the eternal future. Just as when you put a scion into a great tree, the scion begins at once to get the benefit of all the past years of that tree's life as well as all its present vigor and power and fruitfulness, so, if you are ingrafted into God, all the eternal past of God contributes to your present security, to your present strength, and to your future victory and glory. Eternal life is bliss; eternal life is power; eternal life is glory; eternal life is holiness; none of which things are necessary in immortality.

Alfred Russel Wallace takes this world to be the heart of the universe, claiming that it stands in the center of the plane of the Milky Way, which is the external visible ring of the universe; that it is the only planet that has the conditions of atmosphere and moisture and volcanic and desert dust, necessary for the sustentation of life. Whether it is true or not I do not know, but it has been said that the writer was overwhelmed with the idea that nothing could solve the mystery of this creation except the unspeakable grandeur of a human soul.

Think of the future of any redeemed man, when ages and cycles have passed by, growing more and more like God, expanding in capacity to understand God, and sympathize with God; growing more and more into the resemblance and stature of the divine, with an infinite growth always before him, and constant approximation nearer and nearer to the sublime perfection of the Deity. And then think of a whole redeemed humanity standing in the glow and glory of that future, brought by the power of the Lord Jesus Christ's atonement into such relationship with God that even the angels might envy and covet the privilege of being next to God in the person of His Son.

Correspondence.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I so much approve of the editorial, "The Arch Street Centennial" that I feel I would be doing wrong not to express it. I was born and raised a Western Quaker, but it was my good fortune to have attended school at old Westtown during '79, '80 and '81, and to have been at Arch Street Meeting on several occasions, and I know that thy words are full of truth. Would that all Friends knew it as I know it.

Thy friend,

EEER N. GAUSE.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

On account of an error as to the time of the opening of North Carolina Yearly Meeting having been published, I desire to state that the yearly meeting will convene at High Point, N. C., on Fourth-day, the 3d of Eighth month, the first meeting on ministry and oversight to be held at 2.30 p.m. on the previous day.

L. L. HOBBS,

Clerk of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

An influential State paper sent a sample copy to a Friend in which were advertisements, in flaming type, of "fine liquors." He clipped and enclosed them in a letter to the editor, giving his reason why a good citizen could not allow such a paper in his dwelling, even if sent free for six months as proposed. The editor replied, saying the objectionable advertisements would be discontinued when contracts expired; also an editorial to the same effect in the next issue.

If Friends generally had the moral courage of this member, how quickly the tone and quality of the public press and political parties would be elevated. We are responsible for the larger as well as the minor evils we can prevent, and for neglecting duty on this line judgments will begin at the house of God sooner or later.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

The news of the illness of J. Ellwood Paige came to all members of New England Yearly Meeting with especial regret. He was, however, sufficiently recovered to take his accustomed place at the clerk's table on the 24th instant.

A new monthly meeting has been established in Adrian, Mich., known as Adrian City Monthly Meeting. The meeting is flourishing under the pastoral care of Jacob Baker, and their Sabbath School is gathering in some of the poor and neglected children of the city.

Levi Mills and wife expect to spend most of the summer in Ohio. Levi Rees will take his place in the church at Whittier during his absence.

Caroline L. Baily was present at the summer school, Haverford, Pa., for a few days. She is now attending New England Yearly Meeting at Providence, R. I.

H. O. Jones is still doing the work of a pastor in the meeting at Valley Mills, Ind. He has been there since last Tenth month. Beech Grove School, in which he is interested, will enjoy a reunion of its old members, students and teachers sometime during the summer.

Earle L. Harold has accepted a call as pastor in the Friends' Meeting at Worcester, Mass. He was graduated from Earlham College in the Class of '99; taught in Friends' University, Wichita, Kansas, for three years; going from there to the Yale Divinity School. He began work in his new field the 5th inst.

Raisin Valley Seminary, near Adrian, Mich., held its commencement exercises on Sixth-day, Sixth month 17th. A class of five graduated. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Edward Mott on the 12th, and President Robert L. Kelley, of Earlham College, delivered the class address. The reunion exercises were held in the afternoon and the alumni in the evening. The Seminary is laboring under some financial embarrassment, and any persons interested in its future welfare are kindly invited to contribute to the fund for repairs, etc.

Pacific College won the recent interstate oratorical contest of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association of the Pacific Coast. Walter R. Miles, the speaker of the occasion, represented the association, which includes two California and one Washington, as well as the Oregon Leagues, in the national interstate contest, which occurred at Indianapolis, Ind., the 28th inst. Newberg has an enviable record in prohibition oratorical contest work. In the three years since it has been organized on the coast, Pacific College has won two of the State contests and received second place in the third.

Haviland Quarterly Meeting was held at Hopewell, Kansas, on Sixth month 11th and 12th, and we had a most blessed outpouring of the Holy Spirit. In the meeting for worship, Seventh-day morning, there was a large company present. Nathan T. Frame, of Caesar Creek, Ohio, preached a searching and most instructive sermon from John 6: 54, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." He showed clearly from scriptural proofs that this eating and drinking was a spiritual partaking of the benefits of the atonement without the use of emblems; that it was a spiritual communion in which Christ supped with the saved and they with Him, according to John 6: 68. The words that I speak unto you they are spirit, they are life. At evening session, the missionary meeting, Nathan Frame gave an address on the relation of the academy to the Friends' Church. He said, in part:

"That the early Friends were educators and character builders; that education was not only acquiring knowledge, but was discipline of the mind; that the academy was largely a home school, where the students, Friends' children, can come in immediate contact with our own religious teaching, in the formative period of their lives, and thus become confirmed in correct religious principles. Friends cannot afford to dispense with their own home schools. The life of the church—indeed, our very existence—depends on the education of our youth in schools related to our church."

Sabbath, at 11 o'clock, there was an immense concourse of people present, sufficient to fill the room twice; and the Lord's presence was graciously manifested, and again the audience listened with great interest to the unfolding of the gospel by Nathan T. Frame, Luke 1: 28, "Blessed art thou among women."

We feel that Nathan Frame's ministry has been a great blessing to our meeting, as set forth in the following interesting minute from the quarterly meeting: "Nathan T. Frame, a minister of the gospel, with proper credentials from Caesar's Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, held at Spring Valley, O., Eighth month 27th, 1903, and endorsed on behalf of Miami Quarterly Meeting by Jonathan B. Wright, clerk of the quarterly meeting, and Jessie Hawkins, clerk of the meeting for ministry and oversight, is with us at this time. He has visited all of the monthly meetings, except one, in the quarterly meeting, and we feel that his services have been a source of great strength and encouragement." Taken from the Minutes of Haviland Quarterly Meeting of Friends, held at Hopewell, Platt County, Kansas, Sixth month 11th, 1904.

JAMES HADLEY,

AMANDA KENDALL, Clerks.

Cottonwood Quarterly Meeting was held at Veron, Kansas, the 17th to 19th inst. The temperance, missionary and Christian Endeavor work each had a place. A resolution was passed, asking the yearly meeting not to appoint any one to a representative place who favored license. A meeting was ordered to be held at Emporia soon to discuss "The Best Methods to Procure the Right Pastors in Our Meeting." On First-day conviction for purity and conversion rested with many. One marked feature was the fervency and readiness with which the young people responded in testimony. To the end of getting the condition of the work before the people a correspondent was appointed to report the proceedings to the church and secular papers. The tone of the meeting indicated that no backward step was being taken in upholding Christ as a perfect Saviour to all men. The zeal manifested by the Christian Endeavor in answering and asking questions showed them to be alive to the work with a desire to be the better able to successfully meet the difficulties that may arise in the work.

The departmental conference of Plainfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Second Friends' Meeting House, West Indianapolis, Sixth month 14th and 15th. First session was devoted to the work of the Evangelistic Department. After devotional exercises, led by Mary L. Waddle, the address was given by Rebecca Flagler, formerly of New York, now of Indianapolis, on "Some of the Hindrances to Present-day Evangelistic Work." She said, in part: "We not only live in a practical but a critical age, one in which people are restless. Business men are on the alert for chances, and keen-eyed commercialism says, 'Will it pay?' It is a time of scientific research and achievements, art culture and many wonderful things, and multitudes are in the pursuit for wealth, luxury and pleasure, altogether of so much absorbing interest that we can hardly say, church interest has its proper place in the minds of her membership, and that the kingdom of God and His righteousness is first with us."

Louis E. Stout, of Plainfield, led in the discussion. He spoke of the formality in our soul-winning work, and a lack of individual effort for individuals; a decrease of fervent, effectual prayer; a sneering, critical spirit toward evangelistic methods of others; a lack of sociability, and preaching with more respect for oratory than the truth in its fullness, plainness and purity. A very instructive chalk talk along the line of home mission work was given by L. O. Brown.

Third-day evening, 8 o'clock, opened with the work of the Christian Endeavor Department. Devotional exercises were led by Arora Lewis, with a helpful song and praise service, quite a number taking part, after which Arora Lewis reported the condition of the different societies.

Each society reported an increase in membership over last year. A solo by R. B. S. Lewis was very much appreciated. The address was given by George H. Moore, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, on "Conditions of Christian Endeavor Work of Western Yearly Meeting at Present Time." He compared the work of a few years ago with the present time, and said the twenty-four societies were doing just as much work now, considering the number of societies, as they ever did, and that the spiritual conditions were very encouraging. He urged the young people to be loyal to the church, and said until we have something better to take the place of our Christian Endeavor we will still hold on to it.

Fourth-day morning was devoted to the work of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Department. After a scripture reading and repeating of texts by those present, the secretary read the reports of the different societies. Reports were all good, and showed the best six months' work done in several years. A reading, "The Little Chinese Girl," was very interesting and instructive, and appealed to both heart and pocket-book.

Fourth-day afternoon was devoted to the Temperance, Books, Tracts and Peace Departments. Melville D. Hawkins read a paper on "The Relation of Intemperance to Crime," which was good and to the point. Clark Brown gave a blackboard object lesson, showing the deception of intemperance and the rum traffic. He said that three-fourths of the crimes committed were caused directly or indirectly from use of liquor.

The greater part of Fourth-day evening was given P. W. Raidabaugh. He spoke of "How Best to Study the Bible." To study the Sabbath School lesson well was one thing, but to teach it was another. The teacher should not only study the lesson, but study each child. A child cannot be moulded; it must be trained and developed. We can only draw the child to Christ when we have first drawn it to ourselves. There are two avenues to the heart through which we may reach a child, namely, the eye and ear, by use of blackboard and object lesson, illustrations, stories, etc.

The conference was well attended and enjoyed by all. The West Indianapolis Friends served dinner to about one hundred and fifty on Fourth-day.

The Friends at Lynn, Mass., observed Children's Day the 3d inst. A special feature of the occasion was the singing of an ode which had been written by John Ellwood Paige. We give it in full:

TUNE, "America."

Gone is the winter drear,
The leaf, the flower, are here
And sweet June days;
With voices clear and strong
We join the mighty throng,
We raise their joyful song
Of love and praise.

Of praise to Him whose hand
The rivers, lakes and land
And ocean made;
To Him who dwells on high
Yet to each heart is nigh—
Who hears his children's cry
And gives them aid.

Our Father guide our way—
And bless our land to-day
From shore to shore;
And let thy glory shine
Into this heart of mine—
And make it wholly thine Forevermore.

Events and Comments.

G. Campbell Morgan has finally decided to accept a call to the pastorate of Westminster Chapel, London. His choice lay between that and Northfield, Mass., where he has been residing the last three years. He expects to take part in the Northfield Conference this summer, and then take up his work in England.

The resignations of Secretary Cortelyou and Attorney-General Knox from the Cabinet have been accepted, to take effect Seventh month 1st. The following appointments are announced: Wm. H. Moody, of Massachusetts, Attorney-General; Paul Morton, of Illinois, Secretary of the Navy; Victor H. Metcalf, of California, Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The continued fine weather in the cotton belt is dealing successive daily blows to the bull clique which has so long held that market in hand. Last week's slump brought spot cotton down to eleven and a quarter cents at New York, and below eleven cents in the Southern markets—lower prices than have been quoted in seven months. And at these figures the mill men are not disposed to buy.

We are popularly known as "Americans" the world over. Canadians are known as Canadians, Mexicans as Mexicans and Peruvians as Peruvians. What has been colloquial is now to become formally correct. Secretary of State Hay has given orders to all diplomatic and consular officials of the United States to substitute the word American for the words United States wherever and whenever the latter are used now.

The Republican National Convention, which met in Chicago last week, was a tame affair. Theodore Roosevelt was unanimously declared the party's choice for President of the United States, and Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, was named as his running mate. George B. Cortelyou was elected chairman of the Republican National Committee at a meeting of the committee held just after the adjournment of the convention.

An interesting picture of conditions in Japan is afforded by a communication which appears in a recent number of the "British Trade Journal." It indicates that commercial and financial conditions have not as yet been seriously affected by the Russo-Japanese war, and this statement is verified, so far as relates to commerce with the United States, by the official figures showing the trade of the United States with Japan during the present year as compared with earlier periods.

It is doubtless true as the newspaper despatches from Gibraltar state, that Raisouli, the gentlemanly and orthodox bandit of Morocco, is very much gratified at the readiness with which the Sultan has yielded to his demands as conditional to his release of Mr. Perdicaris; so gratified is Raisouli that he now adds a new condition—namely, that the United States, or shall we say America?—shall guarantee the Sultan's promise to our bandit. Of course our Government will do nothing of the kind. Even for a bandit robber there is a limit involving his own safety, beyond which it will be well for him not to go.

At a recent date 21,567 "passive resisters" in London had been summoned for non-payment of school taxes, 935 had had their goods sold to satisfy the claims, and 21 persons had suffered imprisonment. Others are said to be disappointed at not having a chance to make martyrs of themselves. In greater London there are already 26 passive resistance leagues, and the agitation steadily increases. Obviously this is a force which politicians cannot indefinitely ignore or suppress. The kind of Englishman affected has just as much backbone as in the days of Cromwell.

Helen Keller, the gifted deaf, dumb and blind student, whose achievements have been the wonder of the world, and who is about to complete her college course, is on the verge of nervous prostration, and it has brought the greatest disappointment of her life. She began to fail two months ago, and was ordered by her physician to abstain from college work, the result being that, instead of getting from Radcliffe College a degree "Summa Cum Laude," she is not assured of even the degree itself. The Faculty, it is understood, has not definitely decided to withhold the diploma, and the impression is that, in view of Miss Keller's bright record as a student the degree will be conferred.

The Bible in modern life is the central thought for the week of Eighth month 7th to 13th at Chautauqua, N. Y., this summer. The sermon and devotional hours for the week are to be presented by J. Wilbur Chapman, who is bringing the Bible to an audience which reaches over the length and breadth of the country. The eleven o'clock hour will be given to a series of instructive and suggestive lectures by Prof. George A. Coe, who will discuss the Bible from a combined religious and pedagogical point of view. An address by Ira Landrith on "Religious Education," a popular address by Hugh Black, of Edinburg, a lecture on the "Boy Problem" by Byron Forbush, an evening reading on the "Old Testament Stories" by Prof. S. H. Clark, and a presentation of the oratorio, "The Messiah," will bear more or less directly on this same important subject. Among the other important features of this week are C. L. S. C. Round Tables, conducted by Edward Howard Griggs and Bishop Vincent, and an address on "Our Duty in the Philippines," by Wm. H. Taft, United States Secretary of War.

BOYHOOD DAYS—AND NOW.

"Uncle Phil," of the Chicago "Advance," whom one has no difficulty in recognizing as its shrewd editor, Dr. J. A. Adams, thus discourses with his inquiring nephew:

"Uncle Phil, don't you wish you were a boy again?"

"No."

"Why don't you?"

"Because, when I was a boy I got licked; now I do the licking myself."

"But don't you wish you could slide down the hill as you used to when you were a boy?"

"No; I have found it the hardest thing in life to keep from sliding down hill."

"But, Uncle Phil, didn't you used to have lots of fun going in swimming on a hot day, and don't you wish you were a boy again and down at the old mill-pond?"

"I don't find it hard to get into deep water now."

"Well, come, now, Uncle Phil, I know you would like to be a boy long enough to go fishing as you used to do, when you slipped off to the creek and had a jolly time all afternoon."

"Why, child, real fishing does not begin until you are a man and the big fish get after the little fish."—"Christian Endeavor World."

IS RELIGION A GETTING OR A GIVING ?

It is exceedingly difficult to get rid of selfishness. It is like the germ diseases which lurk within after they have appeared to be cured, and which unexpectedly break out either in the old place or in some new spot, and which hold their ground until every germ has been killed. Too often a new kind of selfishness breaks out in the Christian and keeps him on a low plane and in a weak state. It gets into his prayers, it expresses itself in his testimonies, it hurts his work on committees, it tightens up his purse strings and so robs him of the blessing which comes from giving; it shrinks his whole spiritual life.

The main reason for so much lurking selfishness in Christian people, who should be free from it, is that they think of religion as a scheme of getting instead of an opportunity for giving. It is very well illustrated in the request or prayer of two of the disciples in their early, imperfect stage. Before undertaking a risky service they wanted to be assured that the proper reward was coming to them. "Master," they say, "we would that Thou wouldst do for us whatever we ask." Then follows a request to be treated as His favorites and to be given places of importance. Their request showed that their service was tainted through and through with selfishness, and that they were making religion a means to a selfish end. In a few marvelous words they were told that blessedness in the kingdom cannot be "given" as offices are bestowed on favorites—it is the direct result and outcome of a type of spiritual life. "Are you able to do what I do?" They must learn that in the spiritual realm all the beatitudes attach to a state of life. And then follows Christ's law of the religious life: "Whoever would be first must be servant of all, for even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." It is a law which we are very slow to learn. We still ask, "What can I get if I follow Thee?" "What wilt Thou do for me if I will come to Thee?" whereas the real question should be, "How can I make myself most helpful to others? How can I become a transmitter of spiritual life and divine power? How can I lighten human burdens and sweeten life, and make men feel the love and gift of God?"

Yes, but is it not my main business to get my own soul saved and to make sure of my entrance into the city of peace and joy? Nobody can get his own soul saved if he seeks that alone. To be saved means to be delivered from sin and selfishness. It means to enter into the spirit of love, and therefore nobody can be saved who makes his religion a one-seated chariot in which he may ride peacefully to heaven. The first question of religion is, "What can I do?" "What can I give?" "How can I be more useful?" "How can I minister to a wider circle?" No one of us of himself can save his soul. He that seeks to do so and seeks only that loses it. God takes care of the soul. Our business is to love and obey Him and to put ourselves at His service, and he who has entered upon Christ's way of life will, without any worry or anxiety, "keep his soul unto life eternal."

AN EDITORIAL LETTER.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING.

THE two hundred and forty-third annual session of New England Yearly Meeting has come to a close, and Friends have scattered to their homes again with a deep feeling of thanksgiving for the experiences of this year's gathering. The yearly meeting was held for the first time in the city of Providence, in the beautiful grounds of Friends School, where all the attenders were entertained. The effect of the new meeting place was very noticeable. For nearly a week the entire yearly meeting lived together in one building and enjoyed unique social privileges. It seemed like one huge family, and there were many who were reminded of the ancient comment: "See how these Friends love one another." The yearly meeting came two weeks later than usual, so as to give those in school and college an opportunity to attend. The change worked admirably. There was a large proportion of young people, and there was a delightful fulfillment of the prophet's hope that the hearts of the fathers might be turned to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers. The special meetings for the younger members were times of inspiration, and definite interests were awakened which are full of promise for the future.

The Meetings on Ministry and Oversight were more than commonly occasions of real profit. The notable feature of these meetings was the practical character of them. Those who spoke aimed at actual conditions and pointed out the line of advance. How to draw young members into the work of the church and bring them on in the ministry; how to hold meetings for worship in life and power and to edification, were some of the questions which Friends tried to answer.

There has been a goodly number of visiting Friends with minutes present at this time, and they contributed to the power of the meetings for worship and ministry. There have been many messages delivered which must have impressed our own membership, and the numerous visitors from the city, with the feeling that there is still a living word proceeding from this branch of the Church. A large moonlight meeting was held on the school lawn First-day evening, and was an impressive and memorable occasion.

For the first time in our history it was decided to put all the American epistles into one continuous document, and to read it as a kind of epitome of the "state of society" on this continent. The experiment was decidedly successful. The epistles were so summarized that almost nothing was lost from them, and they were listened to with warm interest. The plan needs a good committee to hold over between yearly meetings, and to present the summary at the first meeting of the session.

This yearly meeting has always been concerned for the proper education of its youth. It was the first yearly meeting in America to start a boarding school for its boys and girls, and for many years it has maintained two such institutions. The Seminary at Vassalboro, Maine, has made great progress during the current year, and the report of its work so impressed the meeting that an appropriation of one thousand dollars was made for its use next year. No other subject so deeply exercised the meeting this year as did the proposal of extensive changes in the school at Providence. Rumors had been afloat that the character and mission of the institution were to be largely changed in the future, and much uneasiness was apparent. These matters were referred to a committee which made a study of everything contemplated. An entire forenoon was devoted to the report of this committee, with the result that a complete understanding was reached. The name of the institution has been changed to "Moses Brown School," plans of co-operation with the corporation of the University School of Providence have been made, and efforts will be made to meet the needs and demands in the city for a first-class fitting school. A minute was adopted expressing the deep appreciation of the yearly meeting for the splendid influence, the wide activities and the devoted services of Augustine Jones during the past twenty-five years, and profound interest was manifested in the future success of the school under the care of Seth K. Gifford.

Each year marks a real gain in efficient Bible Schools in this yearly meeting, and there is a steadily rising interest in this work. Methods are being studied, and it is hoped that in the near future those who go up to the yearly meeting will be able to have illustrations by example of how the Bible ought to be taught.

Something similar can also be said of the foreign missionary work—it continually expands, and it has a very large place in the thought of New England Friends. The evangelistic work at home does not yet have very large results to report, though in a quiet way considerable effort is made to propagate the spiritual life of this religious body. So far it does not prove possible to make gains in membership, this year's statistics indicating a decrease of over forty.

Very much other business of an interesting nature must be passed over in silence. The earnestness, the forbearance, the deep unity prevailing in the midst of honest difference of view, the real life of the Holy Spirit breaking through the business—all this is beyond description. It has been a great yearly meeting, and there are signs of larger things ahead.

RUFUS M. JONES.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

SOMETHING more than a brief obituary item should be given on the occasion of the departure of our venerable friend, Nathan Douglas, of Durham, Maine. In his earlier ministry he was a wide traveler, and had attended meetings and visited families in many sections of the country, though the largest part of his service and ministry had been in the limits of New England. He was a person of marked individuality, of plain, straightforward speech, but under the anointing of the Spirit he frequently manifested a remarkable power. His words often stirred a meeting in an unusual manner, as though something beyond the man himself were felt through him. He had a peculiar influence over young people, and even when he passed his ninetieth year this same influence continued, for he grew in spirit and seemed to know how to keep young to the end. His often-repeated words, "Friends, keep sweet," are a good message for all of us to remember.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE SACRAMENT OF LIFE.—I.*

BY M. CATHARINE ALBRIGHT.

Every thoughtful member of the Society of Friends must at one time or other have questioned himself seriously on the position we take up with regard to the sacraments.

It has perhaps been brought home to him again and again what a source of blessing the sacraments have been found to be by our friends in other churches, and he has wondered whether we can be justified in our attitude towards them, whether our independence of these "means of grace," which others value so highly, is not perhaps one of the reasons why we are in some ways so weak and make such little progress.

Apart from the question whether the sacraments were ordained by Christ, which is a matter of New Testament study and interpretation not to be entered upon here, there is the further question whether the history of the Church and the lapse of centuries have not proved that the sacraments have in them an element of intrinsic value, and that the Church has been right in believing them to be efficacious.

If that is so then the problem for us is not only one of the interpretation of texts of Scripture, but of the advisability of adopting or discarding valuable and helpful means of grace which stand on their own merits apart from the authority of documents or ecclesiastical organization.

This is an extremely important point, and one that as a Christian community we cannot afford to ignore.

If somehow, in the nature of things, it is helpful for the individual and for the Church that there should be, for instance, once in the life-time the opportunity of public confession, such as is provided in the rite of baptism, then it may be we are unwise as a Church in discarding it.

If again it is, in the nature of things, helpful that the members of the Christian community should meet on certain occasions for a common ceremonial meal typical of their fellowship and mutual dependence on one another, and the divine source of their strength, then it may be again that we are unwise in not recognizing the value of such a sacramental bond. From this present point of view the sacrament of baptism, being observed only once in the life of an individual, is of less importance than the Lord's Supper, which forms a permanent part in the life of all devout Church members whether of the Episcopal or Non-conformist Church.

Ask such Christians what it is that is the most helpful and inspiring element in their lives, and they will be almost sure to answer that it is not so much the common prayer, Sunday after Sunday, or the preaching even of some exceptionally gifted minister, as the periodical communion, that special service, however conducted, in which, through the symbolism of the bread and wine, there is a joining of Christians together on the basis of a common need and a common supply. The essence of the religious ceremony is expressed in the simple sharing of food and drink.

It is, in fact, touchingly simple in its scheme: the "elements," as they are called, are the elements of our life as we have it in this physical world—food and drink, without which no life can exist.

If this ceremony they are the chosen symbols of the highest religious truth we know. At one time or other many objects of the outside world have been chosen to be symbols of religious thought—the disc of the sun, the tree of life, the winged serpent, the lamb and the dove; but in the sacrament of the Supper we have the choice of symbols common to all and understandable by all.

And the partaking of a common meal as a religious ceremony is far from being the invention of the early Christians, or dating only from Christian times. The custom was only adapted and modified by the needs of the early Church. It is found in differing forms in many parts of the world and at many periods of time.

Indeed, it seems as if one of the oldest forms of public religious ceremony of which we have any knowledge was some form of partaking of a common meal. A certain animal, an ox, a sheep or a camel, for example, is sacred to a particular deity; it must not, therefore, be slain except under the auspices of that deity, and a part of it must at the same time be offered to him as his rightful possession. For the ordinary sustenance of the people milk or meal or fruit is the common fare and is sufficient; the slaughter of animals for food is therefore not a matter of private indulgence, and when occasion does justify the killing of one it is made a public and religious affair. The entire clan takes part in it and hospitality is open for all, while the whole ceremony is one for gaiety and rejoicing, as well as for a certain religious experience. In an extraordinary and primitive form we find this sacrificial custom among the tribe of the Arabs, where the victim having been slain by the priest, the whole multitude thereupon in savage fashion rush in and tear off pieces of the flesh for themselves, eating it raw, so that in a short time the whole victim has disappeared. In fact, the sacrifice is solemnized, if one can use such a word, between the rise of the day star and its disappearance in the morning light, so that literally none of the sacrifice is left till the morning.

In this case, when the first blood shed has been dedicated to the deity, the rest of the animal is for the people or rather for the clan. Every one, high or low, partaking of the feast, is for the time being at any rate an allowed member of the clan, and as long as any food can be supposed to remain in their bodies—i.e., according to Arab ideas, three days and one-third—they are entitled to all rights as members of the clan, and particularly to the right of personal protection. A stranger, as a stranger, is an enemy, but if he has been allowed to share the food of the family or clan, he is part of that clan for the time being, and must be defended as one of its members. He has participated in the common life and drank at the common source and is entitled to the protection of all the other members.

It is thus a very close bond that is set up by participation in a sacramental meal. First there is the bond between the clansman and his god, that god who shares with him in the meal itself, and even provides, theoretically, the victim from the store of animals sacred to himself, and next the bond between the individual clansman and every other member, even such as are only temporarily allowed to have a part in the common life. These two elements are characteristic of the sacramental meal, in all its early forms. There is no such thing in this state of society as an individual and private bond between the Deity and the worshipers. The Deity is the God of the clan and the worshiper is a member of a clan. His religious duties are fulfilled when he has conducted his part of the sacrifice as arranged, and fulfilled the obligations it puts him under to his fellow worshipers.

We have an interesting instance of this sacrificial bond in the book of Exodus. When Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, came to see him as he was leading the Israelites through the wilderness, we are told that after a friendly interview together, "Moses' father-in-law took a burnt offering and sacrifices for God, and Aaron came and all the elders of Israel to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law before God."

Again, the sacrifice as a kind of family bond is well exhibited in the allusions we have in the first book of Samuel to the "yearly sacrifice" in the family of Jesse. David alleged the celebration of this sacrifice as the excuse for his sudden disappearance from Saul's court, saying that his family were holding a feast at Bethlehem, and his brother had "commanded him to be present."

And the Passover feast itself, which came afterwards to be commemorative of the flight from Egypt and the protection of Jehovah, was to begin with probably a sacrificial feast of general thanksgiving and an occasion for every member of the clan to recognize his bond to God and to his neighbors. At any rate, to this day the Passover is one of the great links that bind every Jew to his nation; the Jew who despises the Passover despises his very existence as a Jew.

But not only among Jews and Semites generally do we find the observance of a sacrificial meal as a chief rite in their religion. There is a remarkable account of a sacramental custom observed by a pastoral people, the Todas in Southern India.

"Once a year all the adult males of the village join in the ceremony of killing and eating a very young male calf. They take the animal into the dark recesses of the village wood, and a sacred fire having been made by the rubbing of sticks, the flesh of the calf is roasted on the embers of certain trees and is eaten by the men alone."

In this sacramental feast the idea seems to be that the flesh of the sacred animal is in a certain sense the flesh of the god, and that the tribe in eating it together are mutually partaking of the character of the god. Among the Aztecs of Mexico the idea was carried a step farther, and sacramental feasts were held twice a year in which a great image of the god was made of maize corn and honey, and adorned with eyes, nose and mouth and elaborate clothing. After being the center of many rites and ceremonies the priests at last stripped it of its ornaments, and, as the historian relates, "they made many pieces of the idol and gave them to the people in the manner of a communion, beginning with the greater and continuing unto the rest, both men, women and little children, who received it with such tears, fear and reverence as it was an admirable thing, saying that they did eat the flesh and bones of God. Such as had any sick folks demanded thereof for them, and carried it with great reverence and veneration."

It is interesting, I think, to trace this idea of a sacrament, a common eating of something considered to be sacred, into different countries and among different peoples. There are the two sides to such sacraments. There is the side of partaking of something specially sacred or divine, and to that extent also partaking of the nature of the Divine, and there is the side of fellowship in a common food, the expression of an acknowledged human bond.

The "sacrifice offered to idols" which St. Paul writes about, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, is an example of the first kind of sacrament, that in which the people are supposed, in partaking of the sacrifice, to partake of the very nature of the idol worshiped. Paul warns his followers to keep clear of such ceremonies. "The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils."

But it was not only a question among the early Christians whether they could conform to sacramental rites in honor of idols; it was a question whether the meat which had once been in an idol's temple and was afterwards taken for public sale, did not contain a taint of evil in itself and act as a medium for conveying the evil nature of the god. Those who believed this to be the case were naturally scrupulous about eating such meat at all.

St. Paul had no superstition of the kind himself but he was quite able to enter into the weaker brethren's point of view.

But the difficulty was, as Prof. Ramsay has pointed out, that in some places, at any rate, it was almost impossible to get any meat that was not offered to idols, or, in fact, for Christians to take part conscientiously in any public function at all because of the intimate relation between ceremonies of every kind and the religion of the Pagan world.

Every public or private function in Greek society was accompanied by religious rites. All sorts of benefit clubs, for instance, were numerous in the Greek cities, and, as Dean Stanley says, they were the center of whatever sentiments of piety, charity and religious morality lingered in Greek society. They had their common festive meals, usually in gardens, round an altar with sacrifices."

"The spirit of antiquity regarded the meals of human beings as having the nature of sacred things.

(Ecce Homo.) It is just because those common meals meant so much and were intended to mean so much that Paul is obliged to speak out very straightly and decidedly and forbid his Corinthian Christians to have anything to do with them. "Are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? The things which the Gentiles sacrifice they sacrifice to devils and not to God; and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils."

These festive meals, more or less connected with the worship of some Pagan deity, were then so much a part of the life of the Greek world that quite irrespective of any command of Christ to observe a new sacrament, it would have been only natural for the early Christians to practice something of the kind among themselves. They certainly did so. Every day, as we are told in the second chapter of Acts, "they continued steadfastly in the breaking of bread together," first in one private house, probably, and then in another."

When Paul was leaving Troas for his last journey to Jerusalem, the disciples came together on the first day of the week, just previous to his departure, to "break bread" in the evening. This coincides with Paul's statement that the Christians in Bithynia were in the habit of coming together on a set day before it was light "to sing to Christ as God and to bind themselves by a sacrament to commit no crime."

That the communion as practised among the first disciples was of the nature of a common meal, on the basis of the meals connected with the Grecian clubs, is evident from the fact that, as we are told by Paul, each brought his own contribution and then helped himself from the common table.

In the pictures and carvings in the Catacombs we see the communicants sitting round a semi-circular table, men and women together.

Justin Martyr speaks of the celebrant as "the president of the brethren," indicating apparently that any one of good repute could undertake the duty of presiding, if so requested. He also mentions that the sacrament took place at the conclusion of the common prayer and was preceded by the "kiss of peace." After prayer and praise offered by the president, to which the congregation responded, "Amen!" the deacons gave each one present "to partake of the bread and wine," and carried away a portion to those who were absent from the rite. This sacramental meal was to take place every Sunday.

We see here already the distinction growing up between the common meal and the sacramental one; the latter is to be of weekly occurrence, with special prayers attached to it. At last the common daily meal among the brethren is discarded altogether, and the religious rite, presided over by an ordained official, takes its place and develops more and more on its own lines.

Irenæus, writing about A.D. 107, says that "after the consecrating words have been said over the elements the bread is no longer common bread, but 'eucharist'—i.e., the bread of thanksgiving. This need not mean much, but in 1439, at the Council of Trent, we find it expressly recognized that the bread and wine are not mere symbols, as any other earthly materials might be symbols, of a divine significance, but that they are in some way of special efficacy, and have a power in themselves, if used as the Church ordains, of effecting special results.

The twenty-eighth article of the Church of England expressly guards against the further development of this doctrine, and says that "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, and that the body of Christ is given, taken and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner," but at the same time the articles clearly recognize that the two sacraments of baptism and the Supper are unique because they have their "visible sign or ceremony ordained by God," and are designed to be "effectual means of grace."

It is hard, as it seems to me, to distinguish between this uniqueness of efficacy, which is understood to reside in the baptismal water and the sacramental bread and wine, and the further thought that in some way or other, as the Roman Catholic Church believes, the elements come to have a power in themselves; that is, that they are actually changed so as to become possessed of miraculous and divine power.

When we get this far we have come a long distance from the simplicity of the early Christian observance, or rather the consecration of the daily meal of the brethren by the remembrance of their Lord. But remnants still survive in the present practice of the Church which indicate the simplicity of the first observance, as, for instance, the rule in the English Church that the elements shall be provided by the congregation and not by the minister, reminding one of the time alluded to by Paul, when each man brought his own share of the meal. There is also the fact that in the Eastern Church a distribution takes place after the sacrament is over of the superfluous bread to the members of the congregation. This distributed supply is known by the name of "blessed bread."

Such, in briefest outline, is the history of the development of the sacramental rite. It is a long journey back in thought to the time when the common meal of blessed bread was undifferentiated from the sacrament, when there was still about it that character of a daily family necessity and the consequent recognition of the closeness of the bond that united the members of a struggling and persecuted community. But it is not hard to realize what times of real refreshment and communion such sacramental meals must have been, when for the moment, apart from the scornful world, they shared in one another's faith and inspiration, and felt again that their Lord was opening the door of the room and saying, "Peace be unto you."

We wish ourselves back for the moment, it may be, in apostolic times, that we might also take part in the evening meal of the brethren and share the spiritual fellowship. Nor do we wonder at the important place such a custom held in the early days of the Christian Church.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

LITERATURE, ITS PLACE IN MISSIONARY WORK.*

BY MAY M. JONES.

The two God-given agencies for making known the message of salvation to those who have heard it not are the living voice and the printed page. Second in importance only to the preaching of the Word is the ministry of the press, and almost without exception the influence of the former is effervescent and transitory, unless accompanied and followed, sometimes preceded, by the possession and study of the printed word of God and a supplementary Christian literature.

The work of a successful missionary consists not alone in the conversion of the people whom he hopes to help. It is sometimes supposed that after the people are brought to their knees in true repentance, casting themselves upon the loving Saviour, his work is done—a grand mistake. The missionary's work, the moral culture of men, like that of Paul, is but just begun when they have believed. A process, not a single act, is the task before him. Paul recognized the truth of this principle, and ever sought to confirm and instruct his converts in the principles of right living by the practical teachings of his epistles after their conversion under the preaching of the gospel. The whole structure of the convert's character must be rebuilt, from foundation to roof-top, and it is no small task even to clear away the debris of centuries preparatory to the raising of the new building. If we hope to have our converts even keep the faith, let alone grow and become fellow workers in the cause of Christ, as many of them are capable of doing, we must secure personal study of the word of God, and place in their hands a helpful, stimulating Christian literature, cultivating tenderly but constantly the seed which has been planted in their hearts.

Another reason for the creation and distribution of literature in mission fields is the scarcity of workers. Multitudes are starving without the bread of life. In this province alone of the little island of Cuba there are many thousand souls. What are we among so many? We are too few; but we have the blessed Bible, and we have a limited supply of helpful literature, which may be put into the hands of the thousands of men, women and children we cannot hope to reach, at least in the near future, in any other way than by the Bible itself, or tracts, or periodicals, which will bring to their minds thoughts of better things, and create in their hearts a desire for the water of life—a forerunner of the work we may be able to do later.

A third reason for the necessity for the creation and distribution of a Christian literature is the comparative abundance of bad literature.

What is the nature of the novels devoured by the children and young people of Cuba? One may judge somewhat even by the pictures on the cover. We meet spiritualism on every hand. How has it obtained such a stronghold? Its leaders preach no sermons nor hold public meetings, nor are they men of education and intellectual power. How has this pernicious doctrine, and those of atheism and infidelity, become so widely known? By means of literature. Their books are everywhere. We find men reading them by the dim light of candle or farol, in hovel and shack. Why do they read them? Because they have nothing better. They would have been reading the Bible and helpful Christian books if we as a church had been up and doing years ago. Not only are there many pernicious books, as there are in the North, but the good books are very, very few. All we can scrape together from all the publishing houses in Spain, Mexico, South America, New York, including denominational periodicals which contain articles we hesitate to put in the hands of even our church members, could all be read through in a ridiculously short time.

In this connection we should not overlook the fact that this question of literature is closely connected with two other of our problems—the Sabbath question and the amusement question.

We teach our converts not to observe the Sabbath as a day of amusement. What shall they do? The Bible alone is not enough. We need to provide good literature that they can read on the Sabbath. We also require our converts to give up the dance, the theater, the numerous feast days; indeed, because of the intimate connection between the religious and social customs of the people, almost all social privileges and enjoyments. What have we to give them in place of all we take away from them? They will be interested in something. In what shall they spend their evenings? With what shall their minds be filled, if not with preparations for the dance and the theater, new dresses, hats, etc.? Would not an abundance of interesting, healthful reading be a part answer to the problem?

I have been much impressed by the fact that Spanish literature reaches a larger constituency in mission fields than any other language, with the possible exception of two or three tongues of the Orient. It will thus be seen that the task of providing an adequate Christian literature in the Spanish language is not only a large task, but an exceedingly important and fruitful one.

Timothy Richards gives as his conclusion, after years of experience in mission work among heathen people: "In all successful mission work, whether in barbarous or civilized countries, the Bible has had to be supplemented by other books. In order to capture the attention and regard of the best minds in non-Christian lands, we must offer them the highest products of our best intellects. The sort of education which we give our own sons and daughters must be supplied to leaders of thought in the unenlightened nations. Nothing less than this is a sufficient extension of Christian literature."

Though the little foothold already gained in the territory of literature is worth much, the hardest campaigns have yet to be fought. What has been done we owe largely to the tract and book societies. Our responsibility and opportunity is even greater than ever before at the present moment. The government of Cuba, by means of the new public school system, is teaching her people to read, giving them a taste for reading. Read they will, once taught to read; what, is for the Church of Christ to decide; whether the atheist and infidel and spiritualistic books, or the Bible and healthful books with a Christian influence. As H. J. Bruce says: "Thus the government is doing a great missionary work in preparing this great army of readers. As a rule they will not come to our preaching. As a rule they will take the printed page and read it, either openly or secretly." Hence a Christian literature is a necessity to counteract the flood of infidel and corrupt literature that is being scattered among them.

Yet the utmost that it can be said has been done is that the Bible itself has been translated, and a considerable number of tracts and a few books have been dressed over into the Spanish language. A few school books have been prepared by the government, and a few periodicals are maintained in Mexico by the Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Friends. Yet it is not too much to say that a real literature in any sufficient sense is non-existent in Spanish-speaking countries. I would judge even less so in Spanish than in Hindoo or Chinese.

Two explanations of this state of things may be given: The home-governing bodies have never realized the need nor importance of this work, nor their responsibility for the production of an adequate literature. Up to the present time Christian literature has not been made a regular supported department of the work, as evangelism and education have. As a result, what literary work is now done, is done by missionaries in a casual way, by busy men, who, with difficulty, snatch the required leisure in the midst of other pressing responsibilities, and who generally do their work without adequate native help. Home boards have generally recognized the importance of educational work and have sent out teachers and educational workers, who devote their time and strength to work in schools and colleges, but very few of these have taken steps to provide those whom they have taught to read with suitable Christian literature, to secure the beneficial exercise of the ability imparted. Truly, as one has said, "The legs of the lame are not equal."

I believe that the attention of the missionary boards and societies should be called to the importance of this work, among them our own American Friends' Board, and that they should be urged to make literature a permanent department of their work, preparing themselves as fast as possible to appoint and maintain workers in this field, both foreign and native. The ideal of this department should not be the translation of a large number of American or English books, but the production of books, tracts, periodicals and Sabbath School literature in harmony with the environments of the people for whom intended, untainted by foreign idioms and illustrations. The need is for literature easily understood by the people, redolent of the soil, written by natives, wherever possible, under the guidance and supervision of competent missionaries.

Then, also, we need, first, a certain amount of denominational literature, first of a general character, such as a discipline, instructions to converts, doctrinal books and tracts, explaining and emphasizing the spiritual truths of the Bible, such as baptism, Lord's Supper, spiritual worship, priesthood of believers, peace and others which we cannot hope to obtain from other denominations. Second, literature of a local, or rather national, character, such as a periodical for the church and home, including helps for the Christian Endeavor and Sabbath School, published as departments of the paper or separately.

The man who shall be able to do his share in this work, either as a writer himself, or in the superintendence of native writers of talent, will have to devote his time and energies largely to the study of the language and of the life of the people. The missionary who has just arrived at the point of being able to easily carry on a conversation, or preach an ordinary sermon, still lacks much of having at his command a literary vocabulary. The blundering testimony for Christ of the American who does not know more than a dozen words may win respect because of the sincerity and earnest desire of the heart behind it, but a book of that character begets only contempt and disrespect.

The Friends' Church will not have fulfilled her mission in Cuba unless she contributes at least one man to help in this gigantic task of providing a Christian literature for the vast multitude who must receive all their conceptions of Christian truth and useful knowledge by means of the Spanish language, not only for the native Christians, but a literature which shall appeal to and touch the vast non-Christian populations, and prepare them for the reception of the truth.

REPORT OF CANADA YEARLY MEETING.

The thirty-eighth session of Canada Yearly Meeting closed at noon on Third-day, Sixth month 28th.

The meeting this year was held at Pickering, Ont., part of the sessions being held in the Friends' meeting house and part in the assembly hall of Pickering College.

Owing to many deaths during the past year and present sickness among the members the meeting was much smaller than usual. The yearly meeting has sustained a very great loss in the death of Samuel Rogers, a valued member of Toronto Meeting, in whose honor a memorial was presented and approved by the meeting.

The yearly meeting proper began at 10 a.m. on Sixth-day, the 24th, with William I. Moore and John Webb as clerks. The calling of the delegates showed a number of absentees. Credentials for the visiting Commerce and industry are opposed to war as interfering with material interests. The home dreads its call because it means the sacrifice of loved ones. But above all is the wounding of the love of God who sees His created children living and dying in hate and strife instead of in the spirit of love and helpfulness which is His message to the world by the Babe of Bethlehem.

Educational.

WILMINGTON COLLEGE.

The exercises of commencement week at Wilmington College began on the evening of Sixth month 12th with the baccalaureate sermon. This was preached by President Albert J. Brown, from the text, "Where there is no vision the people perish." He made a splendid plea to the class for noble visions of life.

Under the direction of the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. a happy informal occasion was enjoyed by teachers and pupils as they relaxed themselves at the close of the work of the school year by repairing, on the evening of the 15th, to a beautiful grove near the college. Here a camp fire was built, and food prepared by merry hands, and all feasted in honor of the three outgoing teachers and the seniors who are to seek other fields of labor. The evening closed with college songs and speeches made in "the light of the camp fire's ruddy glow," with words of parting and appreciation of one another.

On the afternoon of the 16th occurred the class day exercises of the Seniors. These consisted of the class history, a class song, an ivy oration, an ivy song, and the last will and testament of the class, all interspersed with music by members of the class.

Amid the decorations of fresh oak boughs, growing plants and college pennon was a drapery of class colors—old rose and white. This, as a closing exercise, was slowly lifted by unseen hands, revealing a pedestal bearing a fine statue of David sheathing the sword after cutting off the head of Goliath. This was presented to the college by the class as a parting memorial.

On the evening of the same day the annual meeting of the Alumni Association was held. The exercises consisted of a brief personal history of each living graduate since the founding of the institution. Some who were solicited to furnish information concerning the members of their respective classes, not being able to be present, responded with interesting and clever letters, which were read in the meeting. Poems were also read that had been prepared for the occasion by absent members. After refreshments the regular annual business meeting of the association was held.

On the morning of the 17th the commencement address was given by James Albert Patterson, a Presbyterian minister of Columbus, Ohio. His theme was the "Discovery of America." Columbus did not discover America once for all. We are all discoverers, each of his own America. Do not act little in a big world. Head learning without character makes a dangerous citizen. Send your children to a college that places emphasis on character. Give your money while you live, you will have to give it up when you die. Put it into men and women. Spend it to make men and women, the best product of the world. God grant that the next generation may discover a better, more sober, more temperate America. The entire address was truly inspiring, and every one was made to feel that there is far more danger of too much than of too little opportunity.

President Albert J. Brown then presented the diplomas to the members of the class, fourteen in number. The degree of A.B. was conferred upon Sarah Elizabeth Barrett, Edith Marie Hague, Claire Kimball Hague, Gladys Lavinia Hunt, Edith Hockett and Mary Esther Mills; the degree of B.S. upon Emery Ray Bales, Thomas Menroy Bales, Adella Mae Burd, Huldah Ethel Cowgill, Alice Lenore Oren, Elvin Hunnicutt Speer, Edward Everett Terrell and James Gurney Terrell.

The Haverford scholarship was won by Thomas M. Bales, who will make use of it for the coming school year.

Thus closed another prosperous and successful year at Wilmington College, and the first under its new administration. W.

FAIRMOUNT ACADEMY ENDOWED.

At the recent convocation of Northern Quarterly Meeting, held at Fairmount, Indiana, Sixth month 18th, 1904, an endowment fund of $21,530 was raised for Fairmount Academy. This school was founded by the Friends in 1884, and has since done an important work as a secondary school. Seventy-eight gifts were made, from $5 up to $2,000. A feeling of great joy pervades the quarterly meeting at the splendid response to the call for help.

Ancil E. Ratliff, William W. Ware, James M. Bell, Joel B. Wright, Ida Winslow and Anna Johnson are the Board of Trustees, and they have worked faithfully to put the institution on its feet.

Enos Harvey, with the assistance of the grand old friend of education, Allen Jay, of Richmond, canvassed the community previous to the meeting and did much to bring about the happy results.

Through the effort of the students and faculty about $400 worth of apparatus has been secured for a gymnasium, including shower baths. Principal Tyler hopes to find some one willing to contribute a gymnasium during the summer. Senator Beveridge delivered the commencement address, Sixth month 17th, before a class of twenty-six graduates.

Our business is, not to build quickly, but to build upon a right foundation and in a right spirit. Life is more than a mere competition as between man and man; it is not who can be done first, but who can work best; not who can rise highest, but who is working most patiently and lovingly in accordance with the designs of God.—Joseph Parker.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

William L. Pearson is planning to spend much of the summer in Saratoga, New York.

New England Yearly Meeting received telegrams of greeting from California and Canada Yearly Meetings, and also sent greetings to them.

Lydia Ann Fry, of South China, Maine, has a minute from her meetings for the extensive service of visiting the families of Friends in New England Yearly Meeting.

The following ministers were in attendance at New England Yearly Meeting: Allen Jay, Amos Sanders, Seneca Stevens, Mary Jane Weaver, Albert Bailey, William L. Pearson, Oliver White and John M. Watson.

M. C. Pearson, formerly pastor of Friends' Meeting, Knights-town, Ind., now pastor of Friends' First Meeting, at Indianapolis, Ind., visited Knightstown, the 26th ult., and preached an excellent sermon. A large audience was present.

Dr. Henry W. Greist, who spent the greater part of last winter in the hospitals of New York and elsewhere in post-graduate study, has returned to New Castle, Ind., where he expects to begin his practice. He expresses high appreciation for THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

Fairmount Quarterly Meeting, held Sixth month 18th and 19th, was greatly blessed under the able ministry of Allen Jay, Charles E. Hiatt and Lewis E. Stout, the latter remaining over Sabbath and preaching a powerful sermon in the morning, and delivering a temperance address in the afternoon.

The public missionary meeting held during Canada Yearly Meeting was a season of special inspiration. The address was given by J. Edgar Williams, of North Carolina, who spoke of the need for propagating the gospel, and for the support which all should give of prayer and money. An offering and subscriptions amounting to $223 were taken.

William and Catharine Albright, and Jessie Lloyd, of Birmingham, England, attended New England Yearly Meeting, and after a short trip up the Hudson, through Lake George and the Thousand Islands, they intend to sail for home from Quebec. We begin in this issue a series of two very valuable articles on the "Sacrament of Life," by Catharine Albright.

"The Friends' Missionary Advocate" for this month is to be devoted to the work in Cuba, and we are favored with an interesting article from May M. Jones, one of our missionaries in that field. The questions therein discussed are worthy of serious consideration, and we trust that some practical results may follow.

On Sabbath morning, the 19th ult., the new meeting house at New London, Ind., was dedicated, Thomas E. Brown conducting the services. It was a rainy morning and the audience was not large, but one thousand dollars—the sum asked for to liquidate the debt—was soon raised. The building is a neat frame structure, and being furnished with circular seats, a good heater and lighting plant, is a model both for convenience and beauty.

Friends in Hopewell Meeting, Indiana, have been especially favored of late. On the 12th ult., President Edwin McGrew, of Newberg, Oregon, preached two very helpful sermons to attentive audiences, and on the evening of the 17th a union gospel meeting was commenced in Butlerville, continuing over Sabbath, Friends, Methodists and Baptists all uniting, with Elwood Scott, of Marion, Ind., in charge. There seems to be an open door for Friends in this section of the country, and only the one Friends' Meeting at present occupies the field. Asa E. Woodard is serving as pastor in the meeting.

The Friends' Bible Institute of Indiana, Western and Wilmington Yearly Meetings will be held at Earlham College, Richmond, Ind., from Seventh month 26th to Eighth month 3d. Among the speakers are Ira Landrith, General Secretary of the Religious Education Association, Chicago, Ill.; Shailer Mathews, Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, University of Chicago; Graham Taylor, Professor in Chicago Theological Seminary; President Robert L. Kelly, of Earlham College; President Albert J. Brown, Wilmington College, and others. No fee will be charged, and board and lodging can be secured at the college for 75 cents per day, or $4.00 per week. Those desiring fuller information should address Elbert Russell, Richmond, Ind. The program is published in another column.

Farmington Quarterly Meeting, New York, held Sixth month 15th, was favored in having the company of Francis W. Thomas, from Indiana Yearly Meeting; Fred Cope, from Ohio Yearly Meeting, and Abijah Weaver, from Glens Falls, N. Y. The ministry of these Friends was edifying and helpful. The Christian Endeavor Union, conducted by Anna Sands Leggett, was addressed by Fred Cope. The Bible School Conference, conducted by J. Irving Dillingham, was addressed by Francis W. Thomas and Abijah Weaver. After the quarterly meeting Francis W. Thomas went to Michigan for further religious service. Fred Cope attended Scipio Quarterly Meeting, and held a series of meetings at Poplar Ridge. On the evening of the 27th he held an appointed meeting at Batavia, and on the evening of the 28th a meeting at Collins. He then returned to his home in Ohio.

The following letter from John F. Hanson, Boise, Idaho, will be of interest to many: "I have been here two months and find this a nice, mild climate and many opportunities offer to newcomers to make homes in a new country. Friends are also making themselves felt as a factor in building up a Christian commonwealth. While this is largely a mining country, there are large cattle and sheep ranches, and great tracts of very fine agricultural lands waiting for the coming of the industrious farmer. There are also many private enterprises for irrigation of smaller tracts, but the government is now planning to irrigate on an extensive scale large portions of arable lands, and has appropriated $3,000,000 for the purpose. Large crops of fruits, alfalfa and grain are raised wherever land is put under irrigation. Many are desirous that Friends who seek new homes should take advantage of the opportunities offered here and help form new Friends' neighborhoods and meetings."

The following letter has been received from the pastoral committee, Noblesville, Indiana: "William P. Halloworth, who has served our meeting at this place very acceptably during the past year, has tendered his resignation, to take effect Ninth month 1st, when he will begin mission work among the Otoe Indians, in Oklahoma Territory, in connection with the Otoe Government School. The relation that has been maintained between our pastor and congregation during the past year has been of the most pleasant character, and it is with regret on the part of our congregation that he must sever his connection with us as pastor. We are pleased, however, to know that, as he and his wife have frequently expressed themselves, the work and associations here have been most pleasant and agreeable to them, and that he has resigned only for the purpose of entering another field of service, and in the hope of securing for his estimable wife a climate more congenial and healthful for her. With their retirement from this field we are left without a minister or pastor and without any one definitely in view, but it is hoped that some acceptable minister may feel drawn to this place, and any one having a desire to make inquiry about our meeting is requested to write to Hattie Baldwin, Secretary Pastoral Committee."

TWO STEPS.

The Last One Helps the First.

A sick coffee drinker must take two steps to be rid of his troubles and get strong and well again.

The first is to cut off coffee absolutely.

That removes the destroying element. The next step is to take liquid food (and that is Postum Food Coffee) that has in it the elements nature requires to change the blood corpuscles from pale pink or white to rich red, and good red blood builds good strong and healthy cells in place of the broken-down cells destroyed by coffee. With well-boiled Postum Food Coffee to shift to, both these steps are easy and pleasant. The experience of Georgian proves how important both are.

"From 1872 to the year 1900 my wife and I had both been afflicted with sick or nervous headache, and at times we suffered untold agony. We were coffee drinkers and did not know how to get away from it, for the habit is hard to quit.

"But in 1900 I read of a case similar to ours where Postum Coffee was used in place of the old coffee, and a complete cure resulted, so I concluded to get some and try it.

"The result was, after three days' use of Postum in place of the coffee, I never had a symptom of the old trouble, and in five months I had gained from 145 pounds to 163 pounds.

"My friends asked me almost daily what wrought the change. My answer always is, leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place.

"We have many friends who have been benefited by Postum.

"As to whether or not I have stated the facts truthfully, I refer you to the Bank of Carrolton, or any business firm in that city, where I have lived for many years and am well known." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason."

Events and Comments.

The government bureau of labor has begun an investigation of the Colorado labor troubles, in accordance with its powers conferred by Congress.

It is reported that the Tibetan leaders are anxious to negotiate terms of peace with the British expedition which is making its way into their country.

John A. Dowie, of Zion City, Ill., went to Highland Falls, N. Y., in a special train from New York last week, and, according to report, bought some land near Fort Montgomery for the establishment of a new Zion City. Dowie was accompanied by some of the officials of the West Shore Railroad and several other men.

The purchase of silver under the Sherman act and the law which succeeded it has ceased, and the supply is now exhausted. The director of the Mint, Portland, Ore., said last week that "There will never be another silver dollar coined in this country, unless by some chance a 16-to-1 Congress should be elected." Whether or not this prophecy can be taken literally remains to be seen, but it is well to note that we have just passed a landmark in the history of American currency.

The President has decided to bring the Panama Canal zone within the jurisdiction of the tariff laws of the United States. The zone is practically a possession of this country. A vast sum of money is to be expended there by the government, and it is only right that the LIVELY 70.

Right Food Makes Young of the Aged.

When one is lively and a hard worker at this age there is something interesting to tell, and the Princeton lady who has passed this mark explains how her wonderful health is due to the food she eats.

"I am past 70 years of age, and up to five years ago suffered terribly with chronic stomach trouble, heart disease, and was generally as weak as you will find sick old women of 65. At that time I began to use Grape-Nuts food, and from the very first it began to build me up. Soon I came to a condition of perfect health, because I can always digest this food, and it is full of nourishment. All my heart and stomach troubles are gone. I soon gained between fifteen and twenty pounds, and have never lost it. I can now do a hard day's work.

"Certainly this is the greatest food I ever struck. It gave me strength and ambition and courage, and I try to do all the good I can telling people what it has done for me. Many of my neighbors use it, and are doing fine.

"I had the grip the latter part of the winter, and for four weeks ate absolutely nothing but Grape-Nuts and came out of the sickness nicely. That will show you how strong and sturdy I am. Truly it is wonderful food to do such things for one of my age." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Delicious, crisp, nutty-flavored Grape-Nuts. Trial 10 days proves things.

producers of the United States should have an advantage over those of other nations in contributing to the needs of the workmen on the canal and in supplying the machinery and other things necessary in carrying on the work.

More than a hundred representatives of the manufacturing and shipping interests in the territory from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic and north of the Ohio River, held a meeting in Chicago last week to discuss the new bill of lading which the railroad companies covering this field intend to put into effect after Tenth month 1st. John B. Daish, of Washington, representing the National Hay Dealers' Association, of Washington, was made chairman. According to the attorneys of the Manufacturers' Association, the bill contemplates either a reduction of liability on the part of the railroads or an increase of 20 per cent. in rates, with an unlimited liability. Both of these provisions will be fought by the manufacturers, who, in order to conduct their fight, organized themselves into the American Shippers' Association.

In accordance with the constitution of the State of Oregon, which provides for legislation by popular vote, known as initiative petition, two bills were submitted to the voters of the State on the 6th of Sixth month, and both were carried. They now have the force of law exactly as bills have which pass the Legislature. One law provides for a system of local option with regard to the sale of liquor. In any county or district composed of contiguous precincts, or in any precinct, by petition of ten per cent. of the voters (in no case more than five hundred signatures being required), an election to decide for or against prohibition within the territory included in the petition shall be ordered. If the election results for prohibition, no change can be made within two years thereafter. The other law provides for direct nomination without the intervention of nominating conventions. Popular primaries are hereafter to precede every election, except for a vacancy, for Presidential candidates, for municipal offices in communities of less than two thousand population, and for school officers.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

THE UNFAILING LOVE.

*I read in the dear old chapters,
In times when weary grown,
Of the Love that never faileth
To find and bless its own.
And sweet are the words with comfort
As through the land I go,
For what the Father has promised
He will make good, I know.*

*No matter what ills betide us
Here in the lower land,
We may turn from the cares that vex us
And find the comforting hand.
We can lean on the Love unfailing
Like an arm that is strong and true,
And feel it is sure and steadfast
The whole long journey through.*

*O Love so like a fountain
The summers cannot dry,
You fall on the hearts grown weary
Like rain from a pitying sky.
Refreshed by the gentle shower
All trustfully we say,
The Love that has failed us never Will follow us all the way.*

Some interesting data regarding the present productions of the area included in the Louisiana Purchase are given in a publication just issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor. It states "that the land area of the Louisiana Purchase exceeds that of the original thirteen States, being 875,025 square miles, against a land area of 820,944 square miles in the original thirteen States. The States and Territories which have been created in whole or in part from its area number fourteen, and their population in 1900 was 14,708,616, against a population of less than 100,000 in the territory at the time of its purchase. Their total area is nearly one-third that of the entire Union, and their population about one-fifth that of the entire United States. They produced in 1903, 374,000,000 bushels, at a value of $235,000,000, their total wheat production being nearly 60 per cent. of that of the entire United States. The same year they produced 973,894,000 bushels of corn, with a value of $352,375,000, their total corn crop forming over 43 per cent. of the total corn crop of the United States. Of oats they produced 331,000,000 bushels, or 42 per cent. of the total product of the country. The total value of the agricultural products of the States formed from the Louisiana purchase

TUNING A PHYSICIAN.

He Got Out, and Then in Tune.

If coffee has you where your nerves demand it each morning, you have a wreck ahead sure.

Think back for a year and notice how the sick spells grow on you instead of getting less.

You are running into nervous prostration or some fixed disease absolutely certain, and when it suddenly takes full possession you will find nothing, absolutely nothing, in drugs that will heal you. Nature demands penalty for the daily hurt to the nerve centers by coffee, and you must pay the full price.

A physician of Cornwall, Ont., says of himself, "For years coffee was to me what rum is to the toper, but I kept getting worse and worse in health.

"I suffered from continuous nervous twitching, insomnia, restless, miserable nights, nerves all gone. Craving for coffee was intense, but it put me lower and lower in health. Something must be done; so I tried leaving off the coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. The first trial wife and I were both disgusted, for we were careless in brewing it, but we went carefully into the subject of preparing Postum and found we had only allowed it to brew about five minutes, and that won't make good Postum. So next time it was boiled full fifteen minutes after boiling began, then served with good cream, and it was toothsome and delicious. That marked the beginning of my return to health. Now I sleep well, the old twitching has disappeared, and in short I am well again. My good wife has also been much benefited by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. We have abandoned the old coffee for all time." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason why so many intelligent people and physicians drink Postum in place of ordinary coffee.

chase, including in that category simply wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, hay and potatoes, was in 1890 given as $626,000,000, and in 1903 it had increased to $866,399,000. The wool product of these States amounted in 1903 to 89,853,500 pounds, or 30 per cent. of the total wool product of the United States, with an estimated value of about $16,000,000, or more than the cost of the entire area. The value of the farm animals in these States on First month 1st, 1904, was $1,119,512,000. It may be safely estimated that the agricultural products of a single year amount to one hundred times the original cost of the area. The product of the mines is also of very great value. The coal produced in this area in 1902 amounted to 30,000,000 tons, the iron ore to 15,859,000 tons, the silver product to $37,837,576 in coining value, and gold to $39,841,500."

The city of New York is to be congratulated upon the completion of the first of a series of public baths to be erected and maintained at the city's expense. The first structure, which was dedicated Sixth-day, cost $110,000, and will provide for over 2,500 persons a day. It has a suitable site in William H. Seward park, fronting on East Broadway, and is built of brick, marble being used in the interior decorations. Special provision has been made for women. This is the first free public bath to be opened in the country, those in Boston and other cities making a charge for soap and towels.

IN MEMORIAM.

CHARLES LEROY MICHENER, M.A.

His life is to be measured not by days
So truly as by what those days have brought;
Not brief were his two-score of years, full fraught
With what enriches life. His daily ways
Had brotherhood of learning that o'erweighs
The teacher's constant toil; he gladly sought
Among his children, childish joys; and caught
The whiff of youth from old Homeric lays.

He learned the best of all that life can teach:
To know the gifts of life—and how to choose
The sweet from out the bitter. His the worth Enduring; life the world can never lose.
Shall love, and work, and thoughts of spacious reach Mean less to us that he has passed from earth?

MARY GROVE CHAWNER.

FOR THE GLORY OF GOD.

WE ARE all sadly in the habit of using phrases which have grown sacred, but which have little or no meaning for us when we use them. They come in almost every prayer, and they are common enough in all religious exercises. They are easy to use, they sound solemn, and so, before we know it, we slip into this "form" of words. Here is one of these sacred phrases—"for the glory of God." What do we mean when we do something "for the glory of God"? What does the old article of faith mean, which says that "the chief end of man is to glorify God"? Perhaps the most common answer would be, that "to glorify God" means "to sound His praises," or "to show Him honor." That is, however, almost certainly not what the expression means when it is used in the New Testament.

It is unfortunate that so many Christians generally think of God as a Person eagerly watching to have His praises sounded, as though the whole end of religion was to please Him. This view has had far-reaching effects upon our Christianity. It underlies all those attempts to please God through self-sacrifice and asceticism. The saint who wore the sharp spurs in his girdle did it because he thought it would please God for him to humiliate himself and that thus he should "glorify God." It is this same view which explains most of the "high church" ceremonies. It is believed that God will receive glory in such ways. Pomp and ritual please Him. He is jealous for such "honors." The magnificent cathedral, the splendor of the service, will give Him His due "glory." In one way or another this mistaken view has affected almost all of us. Our religious exercises show a similar purpose, and reflect this lower idea of God as a Being, eager for praises.

As has already been said, this is not the New Testament idea. In both gospels and epistles "to glorify God" means to reveal Him in human life and in actual conduct among men. When the Saviour had revealed the Divine idea of love and service by the act of washing the feet of the disciples, He cries out, "Now is the Son of man glorified." All through the great discourses in John's gospel "glory" is used to indicate the showing forth in actual reality of the Divine nature and life and love. The Father is glorified because the Son has manifested him.

Paul carries out the same idea in his teaching to his newly-formed churches. He keeps telling his converts that the way to glorify God is to edify the Church. Love is better than speaking with tongues, because love edifies or constructs the spiritual body through which God reveals Himself to the world. Every person who is "a temple of the Holy Spirit" glorifies God because he helps others see what God can do through a human life. Every person who is "a particular member of Christ's body" glorifies Him because he furnishes himself as a living organ for completing Christ's work in the world. Every person who is "an epistle, a letter, of Jesus Christ, written by the Spirit," glorifies God by making His will and purpose plain to men. "To be changed into the same image from glory to glory" is the best way "to glorify God"—for it is the only way to show Him forth and to make His goodness prevail. God's glory, then, is shown by producing persons like Him. He has no jealous desire to hear His praises sounded; He is not eager for our wordy hallelujahs. He wants to get sons in His own image, spirits who express His character and goodness. His highest yearning—the cross shows this—is to glorify His children, to put Himself into us, to give Himself for us, to see His image in foreheads of many sons. When we want to glorify God let us remember that the way to do it is to let Him reveal Himself through us.

IS THERE A DRIFT TOWARD UNITARIANISM ?

EVER SINCE the separation, in 1828, there has been among Orthodox Friends a peculiar fear of anything which savored in any degree of unitarianism. Any variation from well-known and "sound" phraseology has sooner or later always brought forth charges of a leaning towards this dreaded error in doctrine. This feeling of fear was perfectly natural on the part of those who had lived through the stormy times of division, and it was, too, a natural attitude for those who were born when these questions of soundness and unsoundness were the main issues of life. It is not strange that every word should be watched, and that every tendency which appeared to face away from the ancient faith should be challenged.

But our older people hardly realize what a change has come with the flow of years. Few of us in this younger generation know anything about the bitter theological struggles of three-quarters of a century ago. The terms which meant so much then are only words to us. We are living in stirring times, with present issues of tremendous importance upon us, and we cannot feel the way our fathers did toward old issues.

But are we not in danger to-day of being tainted unawares with that subtle error which our fathers held in such fear? In short, are not our young men and women, who live in the atmosphere of present-day thought, unconsciously drifting toward unitarianism? Some Friends have seriously thought so, and that belief has given them profound sadness. The view is almost wholly a mistaken one. We do not know a single young Friend of prominence in this country who holds views at all in line with what is properly called unitarianism. On the contrary, the faith in the divinity of Christ has steadily grown during the last decade. Our historical studies and our studies in psychology have made it more and more difficult to explain Jesus Christ on any natural basis. Those of us who think most on such matters have no hesitation at all in uniting with the centurion's confession, even as Mark gives it, "Truly this man was the Son of God." In fact, we should go farther still and say that to us He is God, humanly revealed.

More than that, the thoughtful Friends of this generation look to him solely for redemption from sin. There is no tendency to substitute culture for salvation. Our modern studies have not dissipated sin or reduced it to a shadow. It is the same old radical moral disease which our fathers diagnosed. On the contrary, the sinfulness of sin seems more exceeding great under our present views of life than it did under the Calvinistic system. There is no white-wash for it, no rags of our righteousness will cover it. There it is, stained into the structure, and we know of no cure for it except the grace of God in Jesus Christ. The cross of Christ has not lost its power for the new generation; it is the power of God unto salvation as of old.

We are not drifting to unitarianism, and the sooner our older theologians realize it the better, because they now only half comprehend the power of the fresher language in which the truth is to-day being stated. It would surprise them, too, to discover how little of the old-fashioned unitarianism there is now left in the world. The old unitarianism of half a century ago was a cold, dogmatic affair, unsuited for helping human souls in their dire need. It was not a Gospel for sin, and it failed to reach men. It has had its day. Our present dangers are from other directions. They are no less serious dangers, but it is well settled at least that we are not going to become unitarians.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

At a meeting of the Earlham Board of Trustees, held at Richmond since commencement, Dr. Edwin D. Starbuck, for the past seven years Assistant Professor of Education at the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, was elected Professor of Education in Earlham, and he will enter upon his duties at the opening of the fall term. By this step Earlham adds to her already strong faculty a man of national reputation in his chosen field. Dr. Starbuck is one of the foremost men in this country in his field, and, as he is a Friend, it is very fitting that he should be used among his own people. He is now lecturing at the University of Tennessee, and with his family will reach Richmond in Eighth month. They have just returned from a year abroad, where he has been working on a forthcoming book, which is to be supplementary to his well-known "Psychology of Religion."

Earlham College is now well-equipped for Biblical and religious work, as there will be in the future six professors and instructors, devoting the whole or a part of their time to courses in these fields. This is just as it should be, and Earlham is rendering the cause a great service.

Did any man at his death ever regret his conflicts with himself, his victories over appetite, his scorn of impure pleasure, or his sufferings for righteousness' sake?—Channing.

THE SACRAMENT OF LIFE.—II.

BY M. CATHARINE ALBRIGHT.

[In the former article on this subject a short sketch was given of the history of the sacramental meal and its connection with the sacrificial customs of pre-Christian times in different parts of the world. The present practice in the observance of the Lord's Supper was traced back through different stages to the simple "breaking of bread" among the brethren in remembrance of their Lord, and it was also pointed out how wide-spread in all ages has been the idea that to eat of the same food constitutes a definite bond among those partaking of the meal especially when, as has been the case in primitive society, the food provided, the animal sacrificed, has been believed to be sacred to a certain tribal deity, or even in some cases the incarnation of that deity. To share in the sacrifice, to "partake of the altar," has been to share the actual life of the deity worshiped, whence arose the warning of the Apostle Paul, not to have "fellowship with devils."

Deep-seated, then, is the thought and practice of a sacramental meal, and it is not difficult to understand the power and influence it has wielded in the Church.]

But the same passage in the Epistle to the Corinthians that reveals the importance of the sacramental meal shows us painfully how it could be subject to abuse, and we read with astonishment of the unseemly behavior of some who made no distinction between a meal eaten in remembrance of Christ and a meal to satisfy their own hunger, one and another greedily taking his own share while others sat by hungry and unsatisfied. And it may be that Paul's stringent words of warning to the Corinthians "not to eat the bread or drink the cup unworthily" mark the beginning of that break between the meal of fellowship and the religious ceremony, a break which seems to have gone on increasing ever since. "What," says the apostle, in indignation, "have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come. Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord."

Perhaps it is no wonder after this that the ordinary meal of fellowship has fallen more and more into disuse, and that the sacramental ceremony that survives has in many cases become a rite, performed by the appointed and ordained official, and communicated in as in the ordinary service of the Roman Catholic Church, only by the presence of the worshippers.

Still, covered over by a mass of ritual and extraneous ceremony, there is at the bottom of the rite always the same wonderful thought that the common elements of food and drink are the ones best fitted to suggest the relationship of the believer to his Lord, the living bread, and to his fellow believers who assimilate the like spiritual nourishment.

The observance of the sacrament is an open recognition of dependence and interdependence. As the thirty-nine articles express it, "The Supper of the Lord is a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another"; and it is also a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death." The communion service, therefore, calls upon all would-be communicants to make profession of love and charity, saying, "Ye that do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins and are in love and charity with your neighbors draw near and take this holy sacrament to your comfort."

I have dwelt thus long on the place of the sacrament in other times, and in our own time, too, for it seems to me well that we should realize how large it looms in the religious horizon of our Christian neighbors. If to them it is a means of grace, are we justified in doing without it because we do not believe that it is binding, or was ordained to be so by Christ? He did not lay down rules for the growing Church, as far as we know, in this or in anything else; he did not make pronouncement as to whether bishops and deacons were the proper officials to rule in His community, and Congregationalism or Presbyterianism the better form of organization. Rather He compared His teaching to the influence of leaven that in an unseen and mysterious way leavens the whole lump and to the seed that night and day grows up gradually to perfection while a man may sleep and know not how.

Yet this freedom from prescribed rules on the part of the Master and Head of the Church has not prevented our own little branch of it from adopting certain forms of church government and certain ways of our own and from keeping to them somewhat strictly. Perhaps looking back on some of our own church history we should hardly now dare to ask what Christ Himself would have said to our rigid adherence to one precise form of worship. We call it an absence of forms, but has it been merely that in all cases? Has it not been worshiped almost as a form in itself, as a means of grace apart from the spirit that should infuse it. Again, our adherence to precise forms of dress, language and our judgment of one another for any divergence from the true pattern—is there nothing in all this of the worship of form? Have we not, in some cases, at any rate, been guilty, like the Pharisees of old, of straining at a gnat in their strict observance of purity, and at the same time of swallowing the camel of uncharitableness and formality?

Let us see to it at least that we do not make the same mistake in our non-adherence to the common practice of other Christians in this matter of the sacraments. If we reject the sacramental meal as a means of fellowship and worship, we must at least see to it that we lose not the "effectual grace." Let us be careful that we are not negative only in our position. Sometimes when report is made at a monthly meeting, for instance, that a certain person has been visited on his application for membership, we are told that his views are satisfactory as regards our "distinguishing doctrines." He is quite prepared to admit that outward baptism is unavailing and the observance of the Lord's Supper unnecessary to believers, he recognizes the unlawfulness of war and the unnecessary character of priestly mediation. Are negations, then, our distinguishing views? Is it enough to protest against what our fellow-Christians maintain? Surely it will be safer for us to put our position in positive form and test ourselves from time to time at any rate as to whether we are living up to it. All forms have their danger, but the absence of forms has special dangers, too. And with regard to this special matter of the sacraments, which we have been taking account of to-day, it may be well to see what our positive position ought to be if we are to be justified in our rejection of the forms. If we have discarded the letter, how are we retaining the spirit? No doubt our dread of religious materialism and superstition is a wholesome one, and our shrinking from any arrangement or ceremony that seems to draw a public line between the more and the less spiritual among us. We are perhaps justified in our dread of prayer-meetings and testimony meetings and occasions that call for open confession. We want every one to make confession of faith somehow and some time, but we want them to do it in the manner and at the time that the Holy Spirit ordains for that special individual. We want spiritual fellowship among our members and a sense of common dependence upon the spiritual head of the Church, but we cannot put our trust in a sacramental ceremony or believe that it will effectually aid us. We therefore discard all forms and outward helps except the one form of our public worship, and that we make as formless as we can. What is our real object in all this? Is it that we seriously believe that religion is a negative and absolutely formless thing, a purely spiritual condition not to be expressed in forms at all? How far are we really prepared to go in this rejection of form?

Surely the God whom we worship is not a God of formlessness and negation, a God of vacancy and nothingness. He is a spirit, but He is a spirit manifesting Himself through form. "In the beginning," we are told, "the earth was without form and void," but the spirit of God then breathed upon the face of the waters, and all the wonderful forms of life we know sprang into being. God is a spirit, no doubt, but what should we know of His spirit, if He had not clothed Himself with light as with a garment and made the whole earth the robe of His thought? His workings of His spirit in us are not to impel us to nothingness and inactivity, but to a working out in the actual world of His divine will.

Our spiritual conception of Him, then, which discards the special forms that other Christians cling to and find blessing in, must not be a discarding of forms altogether, but an endeavor to hallow all forms. The more spiritual our faith is the more forms it will need in which to express itself.

We read that a Christian writer in the Middle Ages, Peter the Lombard, enumerated seven sacraments for believers to observe. They were baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, order, matrimony. At an earlier date Hugh, of St. Victor, reckoned as many as thirty, and the sacramentaries or liturgical books of the eighth century contain prayers and benedictions for a variety of rites, such as the blessing of holy water and the dedication of churches.

Surely this thought as to how many of the legitimate activities of Christians are to be recognized as sacraments impels us forward to the thought that not seven or thirty should be the number; not this or that should be a sacramental act; but all forms should be holy and all life a sacrament.

The communion rite is not to us a mistake or a superstition, but a making too narrow the form that should be broad, a choosing out of one symbol rather than the use of many.

We dare not select a time or place for this special fellowship, and certain prayers and praises to accompany the commemoration of the Life given for us. We desire that all life should be sacred and all meals have about them a sacramental element.

It is a great ideal. In one sense it is the discarding of forms; but in another, if it is true to itself, it is the sanctifying of all forms. It is the profession that we see no need to select one symbol more than another to express our faith. All things are symbols and all express some phase of Divine Truth. I do not believe we can do without form or that we are meant to do so, and certainly there is no need. There are plenty of available forms all around us, ready and waiting to become to us expressions of the divine. There is no need to get away into a building consecrated over and above the stones of any other building, or to partake of consecrated bread and wine, transformed from the plain bread and wine of the ordinary table. Bricks and mortar and bread and wine remain the same, as far as we know, however much they are consecrated or unconsecrated, but they become consecrated to us when we use them for purposes of consecration.

The meanest thing ever made may have a wondrous consecration if it takes its place in the divine order. Our eyes are opened to see this sometimes and to realize the latent divineness in all our surroundings. To take only one or two instances: Who would not feel a sacredness about a few words written on some scrap of paper if they were written to us as the last words of a dying friend? Yet the words might be no different to many other words we had received previously; the only difference is that death has made us see what wonderful things the words of a friend are at any time. Death has drawn back the curtain of our callousness and revealed the true beauty and value of a message from another soul to ours.

Again, there are certain sounds which may be precisely the same on two different occasions, as, for instance, the cry of a little child. Most of the times we hear such a sound we think it commonplace, or even troublesome; yet, supposing we had watched by the sick-bed of a child whose life seemed to have almost ebbed away, what a thrill of joy would a cry bring to us, indicating the coming back of the little life to ours! The sound might be precisely the same as when we heard it with indifference; from the child's point of view it is much the same, a physical effort to relieve its distress or obtain something needed; but the fear of separation has opened our ears to hear what is latent in any cry of any child, and to appreciate the meaning of it. The fact is that we get so accustomed to everything that we get blind to most things. It is only when we get new situations, old things in new places, that we see what they mean.

As Mrs. Browning says:

Earth's crammed with heaven, and every tiny bush afire with God;
But only he who sees puts off his shoes.

We talk about things common and things holy, about things secular and things sacred, about ordinary bread and wine and sacramental bread and wine, but the distinction is in ourselves, and not in the objects of our description.

We have a touchingly beautiful example of the way the so-called secular may shade into the sacred in the old story of St. Claire and St. Francis.

It tells us how for years St. Claire had been shut away from ordinary intercourse with the world, living the daily round with her religious sisterhood, and only seeing the true companion of her soul, St. Francis; on occasions of public worship or private consultation. She longed for the every-day intercourse of a simple meal eaten together, and often asked him that it might be. At last he yielded, and to make the occasion even more to her than she had dared to hope, he welcomed her to his own quarters, that she might at the same time see in what manner he and the brothers were living.

"St. Francis," we are told, "made ready the table on the ground, as he was wont to do. And the hour of breaking bread being come, they set themselves down together. St. Francis and St. Claire and one of the companions of St. Francis, with the companion of St. Claire, and all the other companions, took each his place at the table with all humility. And at the first dish St. Francis began to speak of God so sweetly, so sublimely, and so wondrously that the fullness of divine grace came down on them, and they were all rapt in God."

This was no sacrament in the ordinary sense of the word. It was not even intended to be sacramental, and yet, if ever there was a meal in which those partaking experienced their unity with one another and with God, surely it was this one.

We are not all able, like St. Francis and St. Claire, to know the common elements transformed so quickly into sacred things, but we must all have known at times how a special glory can clothe even common things; how, when our eyes are purged from self, our fellowmen look noble and the outside world takes on a new beauty.

It is Browning who imagines himself as taken under the wing of an angel and his whole being soothed and comforted by the touch until "all lay quiet, happy and suppressed." Then the angel hands are lifted from the brows, and his eyes are allowed to look once more on familiar scenes. "O world," he cries out,

"O world, as God has made it, all is beauty,
And knowing this is love, and love is duty."

If we have not had such a vision as this, we may have known something of the beauty on a smaller scale, and of the sacramental possibilities in things apparently common and unclean, and my point is that if we are to take up the position that special forms are not necessary for the expression of our religious thought and as a help to the religious life, it must be because we are going to accept all forms as potentially religious and ready to our hand.

If we discard the observance of the sacramental meal as a bond among fellow-believers, it must be because we are honestly endeavoring that every meal, family or congregational, shall be a sacrament, and not because we have in any sense rejected the command to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man. If we are doing without set prayers it must be because life itself and work and thought are all prayers and because set prayers convey too little of our aspiration and not too much.

If we are discarding baptism and the public confession of repentance and a new life entered upon, it must be because we believe more in a public confession in the everyday opportunities of life.

If we reject the ceremonial observances of our fellow-Christians, it must not be because we despise forms and expressions, but because we want to elect all forms and make them a divine expression.

We hold not to two or three sacraments, but to many. There is the sacrament of birth and the sacrament of death, as well as the sacrament of marriage; there is the sacrament of friendship, the sacrament of fatherhood, and motherhood, and childhood, too. There is the sacrament of work and the sacrament of suffering; the sacrament of our common joys and our common sorrows; the sacrament of a common gratitude for this life and the sacrament of a common hope in a life eternal.

We do not reject sacraments; on the contrary, we desire to celebrate to the fullest possible extent the greatest and holiest of all, that which includes all others—the sacrament of life.

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING.

The Friends of California Yearly Meeting met in their tenth annual assembly at Whittier, Sixth month 22d, continuing until Third-day, the 28th.

The Meeting of Ministry and Oversight was held on Third-day afternoon, the 21st. It was a time of special blessing, and much spiritual activity was manifested. This first meeting was indicative of those that were to follow; all were marked by a spirit of devotion to the Master, and by a feeling of united brotherly love. Each morning there was a devotional meeting at 8.30, led by different ministers in attendance. There were also several evening meetings of a similar nature. These were the means of conversion or renewal for some, of definite consecration for others, and the means of added spiritual grace and blessing to all who attended.

Though no ministers were present with credentials from other yearly meetings, yet the presence of a few without special minutes was a cause for rejoicing, among whom were Ruth S. Murray and Rebecca H. Smiley, of New England Yearly Meeting, and Hiram Hadley from New Mexico.

The morning session on Fifth-day was devoted to a consideration of the state of the Church. The statistics indicated an encouraging growth over that reported last year. The number of members is now 2,046. The number of recorded ministers is 50. The number of meetings with pastors is 13. This estimate of membership does not include the Esquimos of Alaska, in the Kotzebue Mission, who number 560, and who were added to the mission list because of their faithful Christian living. Not only has the yearly meeting grown in size, but in spiritual activity as well, in zealously pushing out into new fields and in willingness to support by prayer and money all the departments of work.

The evangelistic report given by the superintendent, J. H. Douglas, showed that more than $1,500 had been spent by the general board, besides that contributed in the various meetings. John and Nettie Riley have done efficient service in the tent meetings held in Northern California, a needy field. What is known as outpost work—the establishing of mission stations in the vicinity of the larger Friends' meetings—has proved a blessing to many. The work of Sunshine Mission, in San Francisco, under the self-sacrificing leadership of R. Esther Smith, was shown to be a most important one. The mission's mottoes are "Seeking and saving the lost for God and humanity" and "Work for everybody and everybody at work." A contribution of about $250 was taken up for this noble cause. The amount of the subscription for the use of the evangelistic board the coming year was more than $1,500. The new evangelistic superintendent is Thomas Armstrong. Harry R. Keates was made president of the board.

The work of temperance was reported by the superintendent, Amanda Way, as gaining ground. An address was given on this subject on Fifth-day evening by Tilman Hobson, in which he showed the necessity of protecting the young manhood of America. As things now stand one boy in five is a sacrifice to the liquor traffic. It is urgent that Christian people combine for its removal.

More would have been said for peace had the head of this department been present, but the testimony of the meeting went forth with no uncertain sound.

In the report of Bible schools, the importance of the study of the Book of books was urged.

The educational address on Sixth-day evening was given by one of our best-known educators, Hiram Hadley, of New Mexico, professor in the Agricultural College, Las Cruces, of which he was virtually the founder. His experience in State educational institutions, characterized by an absence of Christian religious teaching, has made him a strong advocate of the denominational Christian college, with the spiritual force that it brings to the life of the student at an impressionable age. He made a strong plea for Whittier College. The report of this institution, given by the president of the board, Dr. W. V. Coffin, showed a degree of prosperity that was encouraging. He indicated new plans for increasing the size of the present building, at a cost of $10,000, and showed that so far very little indebtedness that could not be met had been incurred. The president, C. E. Tebbetts, announced the completion of the college course, and the fact that a class of four had had the degree of Bachelor of Arts conferred upon them. A subscription of $1,200 was made for the current expenses of the college the coming year.

It was felt by many Friends that too much time was being consumed in taking subscriptions, and so a new financial plan was adopted by the meeting, namely, a pledge card system, by which the money for the yearly meeting work may be pledged in advance. It is hoped that $7,000 will be pledged for all lines of work for next year. This year more than $3,700 was subscribed in the face of the meeting.

Seventh-day evening was devoted to the Christian Endeavor work, with its varied departments, which was shown to be both broadening and deepening in its scope. On First-day evening a missionary from India, in native costume, gave touching scenes of the life there.

In the Sabbath morning service the message was given by Harry R. Keates, who took as his theme, "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us who are saved it is the power of God." At the evening meeting R. Esther Smith gave a helpful discourse on the one word, "Ye." Tarry ye, pray ye, give ye, go ye, come ye.

The report of foreign mission work is purposely placed at the close of the meeting, so that the best may be left for the last. During several days there are meetings of the W. F. M. S., during the hour preceding the afternoon session, as there is too much to go into the time allotted by the yearly meeting. The afternoon and evening sessions of Second-day were taken up with this subject. The high tide of enthusiasm was reached when the subscription of more than $400 was completed that should send into the Alaskan field a new missionary, Bertha Cox, a graduate of the Idaho State Normal and of Pacific College Oregon. She goes to assist Edward and Anna Hunicutt Foster, at Deering, a station this side of Kotzebue, where the government is about to establish a public school. The work at Kotzebue, under the care of Dana and Otha Thomas, is prospering beyond belief. A veritable wave of salvation seems to have swept over those people, and all within a distance of forty miles have accepted Christ. A little girl from there, Ashugak by name, in the care of the Fosters brought a vivid realization of the good work being done. She sang alone two hymns and read a little written in English from one of her friends in the frozen north. More than two thousand dollars have been contributed for this work by the various monthly meetings the past year, largely through the faithful service of the W. F. M. S. and the missionary superintendent, I. H. Cammack. There are other Friends belonging to this meeting laboring in mission fields, whose work, though self-supporting, is recognized by the Board of Missions. Five are laboring in Guatemala, four are laboring among the Indians of California. These have all gone forth from the training school for Christian workers in Los Angeles. Perhaps there is no one department that has so tender to unite the membership of this yearly meeting as the cause of missions. As was said by one missionary, "It is not so much work for God as work with God, done from a feeling of love as well as duty. In the home field the labors of Irvin and Margaret Taber, among the Spanish, is being attended with some hopeful results.

Before adjournment a vote of thanks was tendered the clerks, John Chawner, R. Esther Smith and Charity E. Way, for their efficient services; to the caretakers, and to those who had charge of the dining room below, where meals were served to all who wished, at a reasonable price.

The meeting concluded in a consecration service for all mission and evangelistic workers and the heads of departments, and all withdrew with the feeling that it was the best yearly meeting ever held in California.

Through a kind and sympathetic letter from Edgar T. Hole, who, with Arthur Chilson, is in charge of the Friends' Mission at Kaimosi, the sad intelligence has reached his family and circle of friends in New England, of the sudden death of this talented and earnest young man and devoted member of the Society of Friends.

William Wendte was born and reared in the Unitarian fellowship, but a few years since, at Newburyport, found himself attracted and convinced by the worship and teaching of the Society of Friends, adopted its principles and garb, and determined to give himself to its extension. His family, in accordance with their own view of the sacredness of individual conviction and the leadings of the Spirit, in no wise opposed his change of religious connection. They noted with thankfulness that it brought him peace of mind and singleness of purpose, deepened his spiritual life, quickened his moral nature, and made him an even better son, brother and relative.

Latterly it had become his serious purpose to give himself to the missionary field under Friends' auspices. Throwing up his business position he undertook a preliminary journey to Africa and Asia to study the situation at first hand, and ascertain whether he was fitted for a service which he felt was worthy of the highest faculties and most perfect consecration of a Christian.

Hospitably received at Kaimosi, he wrote interesting letters about his stay and observations at that station, one of these, published in the "Churchman," of New York (one of whose editors is his maternal uncle) attracting considerable attention. From Kaimosi he had purposed visiting missionary points in India and Japan, before returning to his home in Boston and deciding on his future course. But the Eternal Wisdom willed it otherwise. During an outbreak of the savage Navori tribe, neighbors of the peaceable Kavirondos, among whom the Kaimosi missionaries labor, the young apostle was ambushed and shot through the body. The day following, his burial took place, under a spreading tree, in the presence of the few whites at the station and many sympathetic natives, to whom he had already endeared himself.

William Wendte possessed an unusually acute and curious mind and a remarkably retentive memory. He was widely read in general literature, with a strong inclination to natural science. His knowledge of botany was especially noteworthy, and made him somewhat of an authority on this subject. For several years past he had been actively interested in the Botanical Society in Boston. Gifted with ready speech, a keen sense of humor, and an amiable and affectionate disposition, his conversation and companionship were greatly prized by his acquaintances in his native city and in Newburyport, the latter place for some years past his home. He attended Friends' meetings in Amesbury and Boston with great faithfulness, and was an unobtrusive, much-respected member of their communion. His early death removes from their midst one who, had he lived, would doubtless have been a most useful and honored servant of their cause, while it deprives his mother and sister of a beloved son and brother, in whose future they had the profoundest interest and faith. It is their privilege, as Christians, to believe that this future is not imperiled, but only the more assured, by his translation to another and higher sphere of service, and they comfort each other with the thought that it is well with their loved and lost one, whose young life has flowered in immortality. With the prayer that God may raise up like-minded laborers for His cause on earth, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES WILLIAM WENDTE, Minister Parker Memorial, Boston.

Contemporary Rulers.—In Israel, Ahab; Ahaziah and Jehoram; Syria, Benhadad.

Prophets.—In Judah, Jahaziel; in Israel, Elijah, Jehu, Micaiah.

Place.—Jerusalem. The battle of Ramoth-Gilead took place east of the Jordan.

Parallel Account.—1 Kings 22.

Jehoshaphat was one of the few good kings of Judah. He was the son of Asa. His mother was Azubah, of whom we have no knowledge. He was about 35 when he came to the throne. He followed the wise policy of his father, and during his reign Judah was at her height of prosperity. The one evil thing above all others which Jehoshaphat did was to marry his son Jehoram to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, King of Israel, and Jezebel his wicked wife. From motives of state it was apparently politically wise, but it proved to be the cause of untold evil to Jehoram and his kingdom, for Athaliah was an idolater, and introduced idolatry into Judah.

1. "Returned to his house." From the battle of Ramoth-Gilead, which he and Ahab had fought against Benhadad, King of Syria, and in which Ahab had been killed. Read the graphic account given in 2 Chron. 18. "In peace." Rather, "safe," as compared with Ahab. There should be no division between chapters 18 and 19. Compare 2 Chron. 18: 16, 27.

2. "Jehu." He was a prophet of Israel. He had foretold the downfall of the dynasty of Baasha (1 Kings 16: 1-7, 12.) "Hanani." (2 Chron. 16: 7.) "To meet." He did not wait until the king had got comfortably settled down. "Shouldest thou," etc. The prophet took no account of the worldly and political motives which had induced Jehoshaphat to join with the wicked Ahab. "Wrath is upon thee." The evidence was that he was returning from a defeat in which his ally had been slain. Compare also 2 Chron. 25: 35-37. Loss, disaster, misfortune of every kind was in those days always considered as a punishment from God. Compare also John 9: 2.

3. "Nevertheless." Notwithstanding this sin or error, there is very much that is good in thee, and thy chief desire has been to do right. The "good things" were (1) putting away the Asheroth, the images and shrines of idolatrous worship—here those dedicated to the licentious worship of a Phenician goddess answering somewhat to the Greek and Roman Venus; and (2) setting his heart to seek the Lord, that is, to lead a righteous life.

4. "Dwelt at Jerusalem." Did not attempt to make any more such wicked alliances as that with Ahab. "Went out." Made a personal effort to bring back his people to the worship of Jehovah. "From Beersheba to . . . Ephraim." The southern and northern limits of his kingdom. Compare 2 Chron. 17: 7-9. "Mount Ephraim." Better, the "hill country of Ephraim."

5. "He set judges." Probably this means that he reorganized the whole judicial system of his kingdom, and tried to appoint men who would judge justly.

6, 7. Note the five particulars which he impressed upon his appointees. They could hardly be improved upon. (1) "Take heed what ye do." Do nothing hastily, consider it well; (2) Remember you act in the sight of God and in some sense as His representative; (3) "Fear the Lord," that is, have reverence for Him and a true regard for righteousness; (4) "There is no iniquity with the Lord," therefore be free from sin yourselves; (5) Be impartial toward all and therefore accept no gifts. This latter is to-day one of the chief evils of oriental (so-called) justice.

8. "In Jerusalem." The capital city and religious center of the kingdom. The arrangement described in this verse was something like a supreme court. It was composed of three classes—Levites, who were not priests; priests, who were almost always Levites; and heads of families. "The judgment of the Lord." Religious or other matters which the Law (Pentateuch) could settle. "Controversies." Ordinary civil suits, such as disputes about property. "And they returned to Jerusalem." Revised Version. This is undoubtedly the correct translation, and this part of the verse belongs to verse 9.

9. "Fear." Reverential awe. "Perfect heart." With integrity.

10. "And whosoever any controversy shall come to you." Revised Version. It would seem from this verse that the court at Jerusalem was intended chiefly for appeal cases. "Blood and blood." As, for instance, between murder and manslaughter, or between murder and accidental homicide. "Between law," etc. To decide what law or commandment applied in each particular case. "That they trespass not." Better, as in Revised Version. "Be not guilty towards." "Not trespass." "Not be guilty." Compare Psalm 82.

11. "Amariah." Probably the one mentioned in 1 Chron. 6: 11. "Zebadiah." Not elsewhere named. He had charge of the civil cases. "Levites shall be officers." Probably the minor officers of the courts. "Deal courageously." Be strong and do the right. May the Law be with the good.

Jehoshaphat's repentance was soon put to the test, and he stood the trial. Read chapter 20.

TOPIC FOR SEVENTH MONTH TWENTY-FOURTH.

HOW TO BREAK DOWN THE SPIRIT OF CASTE.

Jas. 2: 1-9; Matt. 23: 8-12.

Second-day, Seventh mo. 18.—Pride its root. Job 40: 12-14.

Third-day, Seventh mo. 19.—Pride of family. Ps. 49: 1-12.

Fourth-day, Seventh mo. 20.—God hates it. Prov. 16: 5, 8, 18.

Fifth-day, Seventh mo. 21.—Coveting rank. Luke 22: 24-27.

Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 22.—Caste is cruel. Ps. 10: 2-6.

Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 23.—Humility is comely. Luke 14: 7-11.

Christ's whole life was a protest against the human estimate of greatness that leads men to form castes and cliques and sets that are open only to the few for their own honor and advancement. His message was to the common people, the outsiders, and it was from among them that His followers came and that the early church was largely made up. The lines of exclusion that shut men off from their fellowmen also shut out the message of the common Father of all in His Son. "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble."

Exclusive circles and lines of caste are hurtful and foolish enough anywhere, but most of all are they out of place in any institution or organization that professes in any way to stand for Christ or His purposes. The thought that the church is only for the well-to-do is not the thought of its Founder, nor is it assuredly that of many of its members; but it is one that has acceptance in many minds, and we need to be careful not only to give such ideas no ground of support, but also to seek to overcome them where they exist. Yet I have heard of a Y. W. C. T. Union, dominated by a Quaker membership, that welcomed young women of less favored lineage so long as they met with the Union at the "nice homes," but when those dwellers in the humbler abodes found that they were being regularly passed by when it came to the question of a place of meeting, is it any wonder that their interest waned, and that the very families that most needed the kindly help and influence of such work came to feel themselves rather rejected than welcomed?

Nothing could exceed the democracy of the origin and constitution of our Church, but it no less than others needs its full measure of grace and watchfulness to keep down the idea of a sort of superiority attaching to hereditary Quakerism or to some other accident of birth or circumstance, which may be indeed cause of thankfulness, but is most of all a commission for wider and more helpful service and ground for a greater accountability.

Missionary Department.

Friends' Mission, Kotzebue, Alaska,
Third month 10th, 1904.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Although we have much of sunshine these days, so far not the slightest impression has been made upon the great blanket of snow that envelopes this North land. We are truly thankful, though, that the Sun of Righteousness is still warming into bright spiritual lives souls that have long lain dormant under a great weight of dark superstition. A few days since one of our boys returned from a trip to the southward, reporting that he had "found for Jesus" a number of Esquimos living at different points. We have sent forth many young native missionaries such as this "Andrew," and our hearts are oftentimes rejoiced at hearing good reports from them.

There is so much to keep us here at the home mission, so much coming and going (for the Esquimo is a great traveler) that we do not often find it possible to leave here and visit other villages, though sometimes we feel so strongly led to do so that we shut up our home here and go forth, as we did last week, with the thermometer registering 18 degrees. We hitched up a six-dog team and started across the ice for a point about fifteen miles distant. This village had long been the headquarters of our strongest opponents, medicine men and superstitious old people who could not forsake their old customs and habits to receive Christ. The younger generation for the most part gave their hearts to our Jesus last winter, and they extended a joyous welcome to us as we drew near the village. Within ten hours all the inhabitants of the village (save one old woman, who was not able to come) were present in the largest eglo (native house) in the village to listen to us. Imagine a great beehive, to enter which you would have to crawl through a long entrance way twenty-six inches in height, the only window a hole in the roof, covered with membrane of seal, room dimly lighted by our four candles, helped by two native seal lamps; yet into this half-underground room Jesus, the Prince of Peace, came to cleanse and to save. Bless His dear name! Two distinct groups were formed. The children gathered about the missionaries and joyously sang the songs of Zion. Opposite to this one was the group of old people. The message given was faithfully interpreted by two young men. Many questions were asked by the old people. One of the boys turned to us and said, "Our parents and grandparents don't believe in Jesus." Scripture was read and quoted. One old chaman (medicine man) sprang into the center of the floor, swinging his arms and speaking with great rapidity. His questions were answered. Suddenly he began to cry out in Esquimo words that meant, "Me plenty bad. Me plenty bad. Me heart cry. Me plenty bad." Very quickly he knelt and prayed and passed into the kingdom. Twenty-eight others came forward. Each was questioned, prayed with, and each one of them petitioned the throne of grace. Lights were about to go out, so after sessions of several hours the meeting was dismissed. Without removing our furs we wrapped our blankets about us and lay down on the floor to sleep and rest. Up at 5 a.m., breakfasted, and then visited each native eglo, prayed and sang for "grandma," who was not able to be out the previous evening, saw her converted, and at 9 a.m. had our second meeting, at which four men (all that were left unconverted in the village) came to our Jesus. At about 12 noon we hitched up our teams and returned in a "baby blizzard" to our home, thankful, indeed, that we were leaving behind us a village of about three score people every one of which was a professed follower of our blessed Redeemer. Why shouldn't we be thankful for the privilege of laboring among such a kindly receptive people.

Fourth month 20th, 1904.

Our winter mail service ends in a few days, then for almost three months we shall very truly be shut in. The breaking of river ice prevents travel by dog or reindeer, and the great fields of floating ice on the sea prevents steamers reaching us, so that it will be well along in Seventh month before we hear the first welcome "steamer" cry. No matter what hour of day or night it sounds many natives will hear it and will run to the mission, crying out, "Steamboat talks," or "Steamer speaks!"

I have recently returned from a two-hundred-and-seventy-mile "circuit ride" to the southward, using a team of seven dogs to travel by. It may surprise some who are unacquainted with this animal as a beast of travel to learn that we traveled some days more than fifty miles, the dogs traveling in a steady trot over the ice for a period of about 9 hours, averaging between five and six miles each hour. I was absent from the mission eight days and held several meetings for natives and one for whites at a mining town to the southward. I performed eleven marriage ceremonies, received a number of natives, seven half-whites and one white man, into our Church, had the inexpressible joy of seeing sixty or more enter into His kingdom. I visited our reindeer camp, where a herd of more than 500 deer were found grazing on the snow-clad hills, pawing away with their hoofs ice and snow until they found the prized moss beneath. A number of little fawns had arrived, but about one-third had died, for the temperature was 23 degrees, a rather cold world for even little reindeer to be ushered into. I finally reached the mission on the eighth day, with no more serious mishaps than a frozen nose, glad, indeed, to be back with the home flock.

We have a very healthy membership at present, both as to size and quality. Our good-standing list now totals up to above 560—two Japanese, one white, several half-whites, and the rest Esquimo.

White people from distant points tell us many incidents that point to a great work of grace among even our more distant members.

One Jewish merchant at a point almost one hundred miles distant tells me that his tobacco trade had fallen off 80 per cent. in the past year. His wife attended one of the native meetings held when I was at their town and was so impressed by the change in the natives that she was constrained to hear more about Jesus, and our belief in Him. She expressed a desire for a New Testament that she might read the story of our Jesus. She twice sent for me to visit at her home and tell her of the faith that was within me.

At another distant point the wife of a saloonkeeper, herself a very good woman, entertained me during my visit, and told me that last winter she was arranging a Christmas entertainment and had taught one miss of ten a little piece to recite or sing and asked her to take a step or two in a dance to illustrate the part, but the lassie said, "No! Missionary speak, no dance!"

Pray for the successful working out of His will in this mission field.

His Friend and Thine,

DANA THOMAS.

Educational.

PACIFIC COLLEGE.

The commencement exercises of Pacific College closed Fourth-day morning, Sixth month 22d. Some interesting exercises preceded the exercises of the final day. Acting President C. E. Lewis gave the baccalaureate sermon, First-day morning, Sixth month 19th. Most of the other denominations in town adjourned services in their respective places and united with the Friends in this service of common interest. The exercises of class day were unique and heartily enjoyed. Dr. Cliff, a Baptist minister from Salem, gave the class address on Fourth-day morning, and Marvin Blair gave the oration, representing the class.

Bachelor's degrees were conferred upon Aubrey Kramien, Calvin Blair, Marvin Blair, Carl Nelson, Gertrude Minthorn, Elizabeth Kirk and Carrie Turner, all of whom are earnest Christian workers, and all except two, members with Friends.

Walter Miles, a member of the Sophomore Class of Pacific College, who received first place in the Prohibition Contest of the Pacific Coast States, spoke in the National Prohibition Contest, held at Indianapolis at the time of the National Prohibition Convention. Rayner W. Kelsey accompanied the speaker to that place.

Correspondence.

Amboy, Ind., Seventh month 1st, 1904.

Editor of AMERICAN FRIEND:

We reached home safely a few days since, after an absence of nearly three and a half months, on our visit to the Orient and the World's Sunday School cruise. Six of the Friends' Yearly Meetings on the American continent were represented at the World's Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem by the twenty-six Friends on board the Grosser Kurfurst, which sailed from New York, Third month 8th. It was estimated that there were more Friends among the World's Sunday School Convention delegates from America, according to church membership enrollment, than that of any other denomination.

London Yearly Meeting was also well represented, but, as the convention and the Friends' mission stations visited have been reported, we will not refer to them further. We did not return with the world's Sunday School cruise party, but crossed Europe and visited the principal places of interest on the way, including the St. Gothard Road and the Alps Mountains in Switzerland, the beautiful Lake Lucerne, with its monument to William Tell, and the battle grounds of Waterloo, and took a day's ride on the Rhine River, in addition to visiting Paris, Brussels, Strassburg, Milan, Genoa and other cities en route.

We arrived in London just in time to attend London Yearly Meeting of Friends, which we very much enjoyed, although their methods and lines of work differ somewhat from the more progressive spirit in some of our American yearly meetings. London Friends are doing much good along the lines of missionary work and the adult school movement. If some of the methods which we saw in the adult Bible School work were carried into the church, some of their perplexing problems of how to hold their young people would be solved and their membership largely increased.

We attended the British National Christian Endeavor Convention while in London, where interest and enthusiasm were very marked among the young people. The Friends also held their annual Christian Endeavor convention at one session of London Yearly Meeting. The Christian Endeavor work is comparatively new to many of the English Friends, but we were glad to find the interest growing, and hope many new societies will be organized the coming year. If, in this day of progress, the young people are held in the Church, they must be allowed to develop their talents; and surely there is no better place to begin work than in the Bible School and Christian Endeavor Societies.

Before leaving England we attended some of the Sabbath Schools, open-air and mission meetings in and around London, then went to Northern Ireland for a short visit with friends and relatives before our return home.

We gratefully acknowledge our Heavenly Father's protecting care over us; for all the blessings that came to us while away; for the many places visited and lessons learned; but most of all for the privilege of viewing the land of sacred story and treading in the earthly footsteps of our blessed Master.

Your friends,

ROBERT and JENNIE RIDGWAY.

The report from California Yearly Meeting this year gives an increase of 155 over the total membership of last year.

Oscar Moon attended Friends' meeting at Carthage, Ind., the 3d instant, and preached to a large and appreciative audience.

J. O. Binford had a message from the Lord to the Friends of Raysville, Ind., which was well received, on First-day, the 3d instant.

A camp-meeting was held in Osborne County, Kan., last month in which Friends took part. A number of persons were definitely blessed.

John M. Watson is staying at present at the home of Charles Goddard, at Dartmouth, Mass., the latter's wife being John M. Watson's daughter.

Richard H. Thomas has been successfully moved from his home in Baltimore to a quiet summer home in the mountains, and he is now progressing well.

Allen and Naomi Jay visited Winthrop, Me., after the close of New England Yearly Meeting. Allen Jay had acceptable service in Winthrop Meeting on First-day.

Thomas Armstrong has closed his work as pastor in the meeting at Newberg, Oregon, and he and his wife have returned to their home, Whittier, California. These dear Friends will be much missed in Newberg. Thomas Armstrong was highly respected in the community, both within and without the pale of the membership for his staunch adherence to his convictions of right. He vacated the place feeling that he must give way to younger workers.

We have already called attention to the fact that North Carolina Yearly Meeting opens at High Point on 3d of Eighth month (not on the 10th, as was first announced). There is to be a conference of workers, and the regular meeting on ministry and oversight during the day previous. A letter from Eli Reece says: "We hope many visiting Friends may have a call to come to our yearly meeting." They are requested to inform either W. T. Parker or Eli Reece, of High Point, of their intention.

A very pleasing event took place at the Friends' Meeting House, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the evening of the 21st ult., when a reception was held in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of E. D. Gildersleeve's appointment as minister in the meeting. It was a very happy gathering, and the social part of the function, and also the speaking, was enjoyed to the fullest extent. An interesting feature of the evening was the presentation of a handsome silver loving cup to the guest of honor. It has three handles, which Chairman Ferris said represented the Church, the Sabbath School and the Christian Endeavor Society. The chairman referred to the good and faithful work which E. D. Gildersleeve had done during his quarter of a century of ministry, and the love which he had inspired in the congregation. E. D. Gildersleeve, in his reply accepting the beautiful present, made an interesting retrospect of the twenty-five years, told the story of his conversion to the Friends' faith, and his labors in and out of the Church since then. He expressed his gratitude for the beautiful gift, and more than the gift, the love behind it, and which suggested it.

The sixth annual meeting of the Nebraska Church and Educational Association of Friends was held at Central City, Neb., Sixth month 9th to 12th. The meeting this year was one of the best ever held by this association. The purpose of the association was this year carried out as usual in combining church and college interests in one program. The opening session was characterized by a devotional hour, in which many took part. Following this hour, President Parisho spoke upon the "Purposes and Benefits of a Christian College." The missionary program of the afternoon was one of interest and profit. In the evening Prof. Edwin Jay, of Friends' University, Wichita, Kan., gave a very instructive educational address. On Sixth-day morning, after the business hour, Prof. Jay gave a Bible lesson, subject: "The Kingdom of Heaven." We glean a few from the many choice thoughts given in the Bible lesson: "A dispensation is very different from a historical period. A dispensation is a different way of access to God, according to changes in human apprehension, not in God. The symbolical observances were perfect in their fitness to teach the people higher things. The gospel period is the dispensation of the Holy Spirit." Again, in a Bible lesson, "A Better Covenant," taken from the epistle to the Hebrews, Prof. Jay said: "A covenant means not something limited by a single act, but rather a certain relationship toward God. Our covenant is not of ceremonies or ordinances. We do not come into intimacy with God in that way." On Seventh-day morning Prof. Jay gave a third Bible lesson, this one from Ephesians, subject: "The Eternal Purpose in Christ Jesus." He said in part: "The principal thought in Ephesians is foreordination. Not that which makes us slaves doomed to a certain destiny, but our lives are provided for in Him. Our joy and steadfastness depend on our apprehension of what is prepared for us. A man's experience depends on his apprehension of God. The real thing is that we should be holy before Him in love." H. M. Pilot, pastor in Friends' Meeting at Marshaltown, Ia., was present during the association. In his usual evangelic and earnest way he preached the word on Sixth-day, Seventh-day and First-day evenings. On First-day evening, at the close of a very earnest appeal to the unsaved and those out of harmony with God, a number of earnest seekers were blessed in converting, renewing and sanctifying power, and many were the testimonies to special blessing from God. The Nebraska Church and Educational Association is to the Friends in Nebraska what the yearly meetings are to the people in other States. A large per cent. of the membership, on account of distance, do not attend yearly meeting, and the association to these is a feast. There were many kind expressions of the care and interest that Iowa Yearly Meeting has shown in this part of her borders. But it is the mind of the association that a yearly meeting in Nebraska would greatly strengthen and build up the Friends' Church in this open field for Friends, and would broaden and deepen the influence and work of the college. It was therefore decided to ask the quarterly meetings in Nebraska and Dakota and the monthly meetings in Colorado to take under advisement the thought of asking the yearly meeting to establish a yearly meeting in Nebraska.

In addition to our sketch of the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Marlborough Monthly Meeting of Friends, held the 25th ult., at the Friends' Meeting House, Milton, N. Y., we are now favored with an interesting report. A large number of people from the four local meetings comprising the monthly meeting, and the surrounding neighborhood, assembled. The devotional service was led by Elmer D. Gildersleeve, of Poughkeepsie. The clerk, John Weaver, of Clintondale, read the minutes of the first monthly meeting. A short account of the settlement of the local meetings was read by Martha H. Bell, which is in part as follows: The first meeting for worship was held at the house of Edward Hallock, who came to New Marlboro, (Milton), from Setawket, Long Island, with his family of two sons and ten daughters, sailing up the Hudson in his own vessel, between Christmas and New Year's, 1760. Land was bought in 1789, and probably used as a meeting place until 1804, when a new site was purchased and a meeting house built, which was occupied until 1828, when the separation occurred. After that the nine families remaining held their meeting at the home of Foster Hallock for two years. A new meeting house was then built (1830) and occupied until the present one was erected (1887). The Valley Preparative Meeting (now Plattkill) was set up about 1790. Clintondale (then called Plattkill), was established in 1806; Paltz Meeting, 1807; Esopus and Plains, 1812, the four last-named being what was then called indulged meetings, under care of committees, at the time the monthly meeting was set up. Cornwall Quarterly Meeting was established in 1816, consisting of three monthly meetings—Cornwall, Marlboro and Plains—each of these consisting of three preparative meetings. The preachers of those days were Edward Hallock, Milton; David Sands, Cornwall; Nicholas and James Hallock, Milton, and Gideon Muleneaux, of Newburg Valley. James Wood, of Mt. Kisco, clerk of New York Yearly Meeting, gave a fine address on the rise of Protestantism in Europe, the preaching of George Fox, the fundamental principle of the Society of Friends and the early settlement of Friends in America, dwelling largely on their coming to Long Island and settling in the east side of the Hudson on a strip of land called "the oblong," going north to Lake Champlain, over into Vermont and up into Canada. The morning session closed with prayer by J. Lindley Spicer, evangelistic superintendent of the yearly meeting. After lunch a short business session was held. Brief addresses were given by William T. Willis, of Clintondale; J. Lindley Spicer, of Poughkeepsie; Samuel Birdsall, of Plattkill; David Little, of Poughkeepsie, and others. Walter H. Cummins, pastor of Clintondale, read an excellent paper on "Our Martyred Friends," which was interesting and instructive. The meeting closed with prayer by William T. Willis.

The problem of the labor supply in building the Panama Canal may prove formidable if reliance is had upon the negroes of the Southern States. The South has no surplus of labor, and Jamaican blacks are too few by far to meet the demand that will be created.

The Cuban House of Representatives secured a quorum the 6th inst. for the first time since Congress convened on Fourth month 4th. The radical soldier members joined their comrades of the moderate party in bringing about this result. The House approved the credentials of 13 new soldier congressmen. The moderates will control the organization of the House. Unless a compromise be effected, however, the deadlock will be resumed after the passing of the soldiers' pay bill and other urgent legislation.

Some of the Panama journals are much disturbed over the announcement that vessels sailing from La Boca must receive their clearance papers from the United States authorities. They say that it is against the express text of Article 2 of the Canal treaty. Another WRONG TRACK.

Had to Switch.

Even the most careful person is apt to get on the wrong track regarding food sometimes and has to switch over.

When the right food is selected the host of ails that come from improper food and drink disappear, even where the trouble has been of lifelong standing.

"From a child I was never strong and had a capricious appetite, and I was allowed to eat whatever I fancied—rich cake, highly-seasoned food, hot biscuit, etc.—so it was not surprising that my digestion was soon out of order, and at the age of twenty-three I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I had no appetite, and as I had been losing strength (because I didn't get nourishment in my daily food to repair the wear and tear on body and brain) I had no reserve force to fall back on, lost flesh rapidly and no medicine helped me.

"Then it was a wise physician ordered Grape-Nuts and cream and saw to it that I gave this food (new to me) a proper trial, and it showed he knew what he was about because I got better by bounds from the very first. That was in the summer, and by winter I was in better health than ever before in my life, had gained in flesh and weight, and felt like a new person altogether, in mind as well as body, all due to nourishing and completely digestible food, Grape-Nuts.

"This happened three years ago, and never since then have I had any but perfect health, for I stick to my Grape-Nuts food and cream and still think it delicious. I eat it every day. I never tire of this food and can enjoy a saucer of Grape-Nuts and cream when nothing else satisfies my appetite, and it's surprising how sustained and strong a small saucerful will make one feel for hours." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

True food that carries one along and "there's a reason." Grape-Nuts 10 days proves big things.

matter that is being widely discussed is how Panama can replace the revenue which the Republic will lose if goods from the United States are allowed to enter the canal zone free of duty, which amounts to their entrance into Panama, because smuggling cannot be prevented.

The Navy Department will establish a branch of the United States Naval Observatory at Tutuila, in the Samoan Islands. J. C. Hammond and Gustave Harrison, astronomers, will open the new station for observation. Tutuila is in latitude 15 degrees south, longitude 168 degrees west. It is recognized by scientists as an ideal location for the branch observatory. Navigators have imperfect knowledge of the heavens in the South Seas, and information to be collected at Tutuila will add much to the world's store of astronomical knowledge.

The Democratic National Convention met in St. Louis last week, and after much labor adopted a platform which advocates tariff and a number of other reforms, all of which are considered "sane and safe" by the most conservative Democratic leaders, but which is silent on the money question. They placed Judge A. B. Parker, of New York, in nomination for President, and H. C. Davis, of West Virginia, in nomination for Vice-President. Judge Parker, in a telegram to the convention, however, declared the "gold standard at present to be an irrevocable policy of the United States."

There is now much talk of peace between India and Tibet. The British Government already has indicated its willingness to withdraw her punitive expedition as soon as it can obtain from the Tibetans promises of yielding the points which were at issue between India and Tibet before the expedition crossed the border of the latter country. These are pledges of freedom of trade between the two countries and official recognition of the right of the British Government's representative to exercise his functions in Tibet. The British are now satisfied, from their own experience, that there is no danger to be apprehended of Russian encroachments on India by way of Tibet, in view of the tremendous geographical obstacles.

The steam railroad mileage of the country continues to expand slowly. The amount of track laid during the first half of the year, as reported by the "Railway Age" of Chicago, is 1,937 miles, compared with 2,221 miles in the same period of 1903. This warrants the statement that the mileage constructed during the whole year will approximate 5,000, as against 5,786 in 1903. No New England state is constructing new steam road. The activity in building new road is largely confined to the Southwest, Missouri leading with 249 miles for one-half year, and Texas coming next with 234 miles. The far Northwest is singularly inactive—North Dakota reporting no new mileage, South Dakota only 10 miles, Montana only 25, Oregon only six and Washington 51.

Important discoveries in connection with cancer were announced at the annual meeting of the General Committee of the Cancer Research Fund, which met in London last week. Distinguished experts briefly summed up their year's work as follows: Civilization is not the cause of cancer, which pervades animal as well as human life and attacks all its subjects at relatively the same age and periods. It is not an infectious disease and is not transmissible from one species to another. A cancer cell can re-acquire power of self-propagation. Cancer is not caused by a parasite. The malady is not on the increase. Radium has been found to exercise no curative effect. A serum has been discovered from which good results are hoped. The first authentic cases of cancer in animals were minutely described by experiments which had been made on fish and wild mice. No sign has yet been discovered by which medical men can surely recognize the presence of cancer.

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

*Dawn, and the bounding sea,
Dawn, with its rapture free;
I stand on the cliffs by the wind-swept shore,
Where waken the waves o'er the drifted sands,
Caressing each dune with their foamy hands,—
This life I adore and its conqu'ring rear
Rolls out from the far-off, flashing gates
Of dawn on the wild blue sea,
Dawn, with its rapture free.*
*Night, and the moaning sea,
Night, and eternity;
I am borne in the dark to the water's edge,
My shroud is clutched by the hands of the tide—
The chill wind shrieks, and from far and wide
Comes the groan of the surge on each madden ledge;
But a Light shines clear, and I cease to fear
Night, and the endless sea,
Night, and eternity.*

THE KIND OF CONSECRATION NEEDED.

NO VERY far-reaching work gets done in our world without consecration. And what does consecration mean? It means putting one's life into one's work. It means a glowing spirit, a devoted personality, behind the deed or the service.

There are stories of painters who have mixed their own blood into their paint. They probably are fanciful tales, but the idea is worth something at any rate. Until the very life-stuff of the man goes into his task, until he grinds himself into paint, his work will be ordinary and will lack the mark of inspiration. What a splendid sight it is to see a young man, who has been drifting along with the flow of the current, and who has put no blood into his work, suddenly wake up and throw himself with passion into his daily task as though his life depended on doing it. Everybody discovers that something has happened. A new spirit has awakened. There is some power behind him. What is the explanation? He is in love. He has found an inspiration. He is working for the sake of somebody, and this passion of love gives him joy as he works to make a home and a livelihood. His whole self goes into his task, because his life has become consecrated by love. His face shines, his eye flashes, his step is quick. When he puts his hand to a task it moves, for there is a power working in him.

Such a consecration as that we need in all our lines of religious activity. There is need of the passion and devotion of a glowing love behind it all. How heavy and lumpy much of our service is. It drags along with hardly more zeal and zest than the tired day laborer shows, as he raises his pick with effort and lets the force of gravitation carry it down! No wonder there is little pulling down of strongholds.

We need to get a love which will melt down our lives and send the spirit of our entire personality into our work. Hear Paul: "I no longer live, but Christ lives in me, and the life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me and gave Himself for me"; "The love of Christ constrains me"; "We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us"; "We henceforth live unto Him who loved us."

This is the passion, the devotion, the consecration, which our young people need to put creative power into their work. It cannot be manufactured or blown up by temporary enthusiasm. It must come out of an actual face-to-face interview with the Lord, and it must rise as the deep ground-swell of the life under His mighty attraction. Then just as fast as this love for Him grows within, there will come with it a passionate love for human souls. The sense of brotherhood will rise and possess us. The consecration of the mother for her child, of the patriot for his country, of the martyr for his truth, will sweep over us in our devotion to those who need us. We shall stop playing at religion, and the glow and rapture of service will make our faces shine as we pour into the task of saving the world all we are and all we have—out of love.

TOWARD THE PEACE OF THE WORLD.

ENGLAND'S arbitration treaty with Germany has quite taken the world by surprise. The former nation has now signed treaties with three continental nations, agreeing to settle all questions of a legal or judicial character by peaceful methods. These countries are Italy, France, and finally Germany. Many of the leaders of thought in England have made unfavorable comment upon this last treaty. They suspect some deep scheme behind it, and intimate that the King and Emperor have formed some project which requires peace between England and Germany. But there is probably no occasion for such suspicion. King Edward is a peace-maker, and this is only another step in the direction in which he has been moving. He takes The Hague Court seriously and proposes to use it whenever occasion arises. Nobody questions that the treaty with France was made in perfectly good faith. There is no reason for concluding differently of this convention with the Emperor. It is a sign of the times. While two Eastern nations are exhibiting on such an awful scale the horrors and barbarity of war, its cost in money and life, its brutalizing effect, there could be no more fitting time for two great Protestant nations, born of the same stock, to agree that they will settle their disputes in a rational way, and help by their example to bring the world to a truce.

Unfortunately the spirit of peace is not just now predominant in our country. Probably the people are more wisely and conscientiously in favor of peaceful methods than ever before, but there are ominous signs and ominous words afloat which show that those who shape our policy are not at heart lovers of peace. There is a steady and apparently irresistible push toward a mighty navy and a formidable army. The eager interest in advancing everything military is noticeable. We do not wish to make any capital out of the speeches of William Bryan, but he did strike his finger on a deep danger spot in his great appeal in the St. Louis Convention. Quoting the astonishing words of ex-Governor Black, of New York, he made a comment which those of all political faiths may do well to consider carefully. Here is the passage referred to, beginning with ex-Governor Black's words:

"The fate of nations is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees. You may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life. You may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned faces. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to abide forever only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.

"Events are numberless and mighty, and no man can tell which wire runs around the world. The nation basking to-day in the quiet of contentment and repose may still be in a deadly circuit, and to-morrow writhing in the toils of war. This is the time when great figures must be kept in front. If the pressure is great the material to resist it must be granite and iron."

"This is an eulogy of war. This is a declaration that the time hoped for, prayed for, for perpetual peace, will never come, thus eulogizing the doctrine of brute force and giving denial to the hopes of the race.

"Friends of the South, are you trying to defeat the military idea? Let me tell you that not one of you, North, East or South, more fears the triumph of that idea than I do. If this is the doctrine that our nation is to stand for, it is retrogression, not progression; it is the lowering of the ideals of the nation; it is the turning backward to the age of force. More than that, it is a challenge to the Christian civilization of the world and nothing less."

These words of ex-Governor Black are words to make one pause. They look toward perpetual war, they flout prophecy and prayer, and call the vision of a peaceful world the dream of childhood. As for us, give us the babblings of babes and sucklings rather than the leaden eyesight of a politician who does not know what great moral currents are moving across the world, and who fails to estimate the power of ideals.

The meal unshared is food unblest;
Thou hoard'st in vain what love should spend.
Self-ease is pain; the only rest
Is labor for a worthy end. —Whittier.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

WHAT TIME IS IT?

BY LINDLEY M. STEVENS.

Let us assume that fifty years ago the Society of Friends in America was bound by "a formal disuse of forms" to the hindrance of the free exercise of spiritual gifts. Assume, also, that, say thirty-five years ago, a movement began which included in its object the freeing of the Church from this form of formalism and bringing it to a place where we could enjoy the liberty of the Spirit.

To accomplish this it seemed necessary to neglect some of the old customs, while professing to retain all that was essential to a practice consistent with our distinguishing doctrines. In fact, we were told that by thus discarding some things and readjusting ourselves to the needs of the hour and place we could more consistently exemplify these doctrines to the world. In our new-found freedom we reached out into new-found fields. In our labors the gospel was our chief message. Our distinguishing doctrines were, theoretically, at least, understood by the pioneers of the modern movement, and it seemed unnecessary to say much about them among ourselves. Partly from reaction against the old method of emphasizing doctrinal views, and partly from the inevitable result of habit, we spoke of them less and less to those to whom we sought to deliver the gospel message.

To-day the active element in many of our individual meetings is composed almost wholly of people who had been born or become Friends since the birth of the modern movement. It is hardly proper to say, speaking of them as a class, that those who have come to us by request and from other Churches have become Friends by "convincement." The things which that term implied have had but a small part in their choice of a church home. They are, as a class, people of genuine Christian experience, of honest purpose and earnest effort. Too often, however, there is among them a feeling that anything which has come from the Friends of, say, fifty years ago, must necessarily be a hindrance to our progress as a Church.

Is such indiscriminate condemnation of the past and this lack of understanding of doctrine a result of the modern movement? We can scarcely escape an affirmative answer. But again, is not the individual Christian life of a large number of our members, and the very existence of many of our meetings, due to this same movement? Again, we believe an affirmative is the only answer. "Such as ye sow such also shall ye reap." Let us be as honest as we know how to be. The modern movement was, without doubt, a sowing to the Spirit. The wayside and stony ground, the thorns and shallow soil claimed some of the seed; but some fell into good ground and brought forth fruit.

But grain implies chaff. And what farmer, in thankfulness for his harvest, would insist on grinding and eating his wheat, chaff and all? True, he might argue, in these days, that his product thus obtained was wonderfully like the food that his neighbors used each morning, and from which they were supposed to derive great benefit; but either careful inspection or continued use would reveal the husk.

There will always be differences of opinion between individuals and communities of Friends as to what practices are consistent with our principles; but we ought to stand agreed that some effort should always be put forth to make our practice agree with what we profess to believe. There are meetings where this effort for consistency is maintained; there are others where we seem almost to forget that we had obligations of a denominational character.

The conduct of a meeting for worship is by no means the whole field of observation if we would study the trend of the times; but a sustained method of conducting such a meeting is at once an obvious point of observation, and a sure indication of the spiritual and mental condition of the people composing it.

In not a few of our meetings all vocal service, except singing, is performed by one person. Singing is by a choir only, or as the choir leads. Visiting ministers are expected to arrange with the pastor as to what part they shall take in the service. Any attempts on the part of "old-fashioned" members to have an "open service" are frowned upon to the point of suppression. Strangers feel that a Friends' meeting is like a service in any other church. If they should say so, the pastor who has conducted the service of the Friends' meeting feels complimented. Young Friends are being reared under such influences that they express surprise that in some meetings people other than the pastor are allowed to take part "in the preaching service."

Not all meetings which count themselves progressive have reached the place just indicated, but any thoughtful man may see their trend. Where one has had opportunity to observe meetings pass from a conservatism of silence to the conservatism of a pre-arranged and fixed service, and sees others rapidly moving along the same road by which the first reached their present state, is it strange to suppose that the goal of the latter may be the same place? Some are held from it only by the presence and influence of older and so-called conservative Friends, who will soon be gone. If we are to preserve the free exercise of spiritual gifts in our meetings for worship, what is to be the limit of our progress? Did the modern movement free us from bondage to sell us into servitude? Already it is the so-called conservative Friend who is crying for the freedom of the Spirit. An exchange of so-called names may yet be in order.

A father once said to his son: "I'll be home at six o'clock." The small boy waited anxiously. Six o'clock, but no father! "Now," said he, "my papa is beginning to lie."

It may be only late afternoon in some of our meetings. In others the clock has "warned." In others the hour has struck. Where is the promised freedom of the Spirit which should come with our new-found blessings? What time is it in your meeting?

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE HINDERING CAUSES.

BY LEVI T. PENNINGTON.

Never in the history of Christianity have the conditions that confronted the Christian Church emphasized more strongly than at present the importance of the words of the Master, "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth laborers into His harvest." To-day, on account of the lack of those actively engaged in the ministry of the word, many meetings are unable to hear the word preached, much promising work has to be laid down, many profitable and fruitful fields have to be given up, and much new territory that ought to be entered and occupied by the servants of God is allowed to remain in the possession of the enemy.

This dearth of ministers is by no means confined to the Society of Friends. In fact, there is hardly a denomination to-day but feels the same need of more men entering the ministry. But in some sections of Quakerdom this need is especially apparent.

One of the largest and strongest quarterly meetings, in days past, at least, in the largest yearly meeting in America, will serve as an illustration, though it is not by any means unique. In the eighteen years preceding 1889, in this quarterly meeting, twenty-one ministers were recorded; and of these are numbered some of the strongest men in the yearly meeting at the present time. "There were giants in those days." Since 1889, in this same quarterly meeting, not a single minister has been recorded, and during the present fiscal year three have been called in from other quarterly meetings to take the lead in the active service of the Lord in three of the meetings of this section from which ministers were formerly being sent out to conquer new fields for Christ.

Surely such conditions as these, existing in more than one former center of Quakerism and Christian power, should stir the Church to an earnest effort to learn what is the reason for this dearth of men who are willing to enter the active ministry. The harvest is plenteous but the laborers are few.

Let no one think that it is the intention to frame excuses for the young man who receives the call of God to enter the ministry and fails to do it. There can be no excuse for him. He is bound to obey the voice of God, whatever obstacles may be placed in his way. But if we can see some of the things that deter the young man from entering God's work, perhaps we may be able to eliminate them, and thus help to answer our own prayers for laborers in the harvest.

This dearth of ministers is not due to any lack of attractiveness in the ministry itself, for it has many attractions for the young man of fire and zeal and earnestness. So great are the privileges offered by the ministry that the wonder is that more young men do not sweep aside every obstacle and enter it at whatever cost to themselves. And while the young man is inexcusable if he fails to follow the call of God to the ministry, equally inexcusable is the man, older or younger, who puts things in his way, or by any means impedes his progress.

Attractive as the ministry is to the young Christian man of ability, his failure to enter that calling is not due, in most instances, to lack of earnestness on his part merely. God does not call to this work men who are not earnest. And it is not the fear of hard work and hardship that deters. These things, with their heroic tintings, rather attract than repel the young man of spirit and earnestness.

But there are a few things that can be positively known as to the hindering causes, the causes that deter the young man from the ministry. And so far as these things can be removed the body of the Church is itself responsible for the lack of laborers in the vineyard of the Lord. One of the greatest of these causes is the lack of deep spiritual life in the meetings from which these ministers should come. Living children are not born of dead parents, and if there were more real life in the Church itself, and the individual meetings in which those live that are fitted for the ministry, there would be more entering the active work. Lack of proper encouragement is another powerful deterrent. It may be that the young man should have force of character enough to push out into the work of God in spite of all obstacles. But while humanity remains as it is, many splendid workers in embryo will never be developed without active encouragement.

Where the pastoral system has been adopted, many a pastor feels that he is expected to preach at every regular Sabbath service, and that the people will be disappointed if some young man occupies the time who perhaps speaks brokenly, and who has been in the world a shorter time than many members of the meeting have been in the service of God, and perhaps less time than the pastor has been in the ministry. Yet it certainly is the duty of the pastor to do all in his power to develop whatever gifts may be given to any of the members of the meeting over which God has set him to feed the flock. The pastor who fails to assist in the development of spiritual gifts, especially that of the public ministry of the word, is throwing away one of his most precious opportunities. He may live again in the life of a minister who shall far eclipse him at his best, if he will only be faithful to encourage, to push out into the work, if necessary, the young man who has received a gift from God, but is diffident about pushing himself forward and using that gift in the face of opposition or indifference.

And in meetings where the pastoral system has not been adopted, meetings that may be without ministers, too often the young man does not receive the encouragement that he should from those who are older and more experienced in the work of the Lord. These should certainly esteem it a privilege to foster, to develop, to strengthen the gift that they themselves may never have received, but which they can make effective by the right kind of help and encouragement to the young man who is capable of speaking the word to the assembly of the people.

The financial question is one that has a very vital bearing on the dearth of ministers in the Society of Friends. Perhaps it should not, but it is facts, not ideals, that we need to consider. It will be held that the young man should not let lack of financial support on the part of the Church deter him from answering the call of God into the ministry. And this cannot be controverted. He should obey God. He should trust God for his financial as well as his spiritual needs; but it seems to the young man who is considering the call to the ministry that God has left the financial side of the question in the hands of finance committees that are sometimes very careless. It is not merely the paucity of the financial returns that deters, though it must be confessed that it is not always easy for a young man who can readily earn and is earning from $1,200 to $2,500 a year to enter the ministry at a salary ranging from $500 or less in smaller meetings to a possible $1,500 in the larger city churches, where the demands on his purse are correspondingly larger.

While the young man should not let the financial question deter him from entering the ministry when God calls, the Church should see to it that the financial question does not have a chance to deter him. The pastor, if he is the right kind of a pastor, works harder, all in the interest of the cause of Christ, than any one else in the community, and often for a smaller financial compensation than any one else in the community. The prosperous church that is accepting the services of a faithful and efficient pastor, capable of making his mark in the business or professional world, and paying him a mere pittance, grudgingly and irregularly, will certainly have something to answer for on the day that the members have one by one to give an account of their stewardship. There is much talk on the part of those who have been unaccustomed to supporting preachers financially, of a hireling ministry. But where there is one young man who enters the ministry with the idea of making money out of it, especially in the Society of Friends, there are one hundred who take up the active work of the Lord knowing that it will mean financial loss, financial hardships, and often privations for themselves and those they love more than life. Usually the minister who is preaching at a salary of $1,000 is not receiving $1,000 for preaching, but is paying $1,000 for the privilege, as in most cases he could easily be earning $2,000 or more in such a profession as that of the law. The church that can do it ought to choose as pastor, under the direction of God, the man best fitted for that place, and then pay him, with as much regularity as though he were working in a bank, as much money as he is capable of earning in any honest pursuit. Is not the work of the Lord at least as important as any other work? And is not the laborer as worthy of his hire? It is a shame when a capable man must retire from the ministry and enter business for himself, and when asked his reasons for doing so must say that he had seven good reasons, his wife and six children, who had to be clothed and fed, and could not be on the meager pittance doled out to him by the church for which he was devoting the best years of his life.

But there is one thing that is harder for the young man to face than the meager salary, irregularly paid, even in meetings that pay their servants in the ministry most poorly. This is the attitude that many even in this day take toward the man that they consider among the "hireling ministry." They look upon him as an object of charity, and this is positively intolerable to the independent young man. It is hard enough for him to be counted a fool for Christ's sake, and to have constantly to face the statement, often from his own former business associates, that he has made a fool of himself by entering the ministry, where the probability is that he will starve to death. But when, in addition to being counted a fool for Christ's sake by those out of the church, he must be counted a pauper by those in the church who should "esteem him very highly in love for his works' sake," the young man's cup of bitterness is well nigh full. Is it strange that the young man of family should hesitate before he enters the ministry, knowing that these are among the things that it will mean?

Again let it be emphasized that the young man, when he hears the call of God to the ministry, should respond, whatever the cost, or whatever the barriers in the way, for the rewards far exceed the drawbacks in the work of God. But let those of us who have the power to aid see to it that the way into the active work and the way in it are made as plain and easy as possible, lest some whom God has called refuse to answer. Let us see to it that our meetings are meetings of life and power. Let us give proper help and encouragement to those whom God has blessed with special gifts. Let us put the financial question, when that comes before us, in such condition that it cannot deter the young man, and let us look upon the ministry as we should look upon those who become, in a peculiar sense, ambassadors for Christ.

THE LAW OF GROWTH.

BY GEORGE MATHESON.

"Jesus said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up; he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."—Mark 4: 26, 27, 28.

I propose to render these words of our Lord, "So is the kingdom of God," by the words, "Such is ever the course of Divine providence"; and if you give his rendering, which I think is our Lord's meaning, you will find a fresh light upon the whole subject. "Such is ever the course of Divine providence." Jesus says, "You do not need, in order to see my typical kingdom, to go back to the beginning of creation. You do not need, in order to see that kingdom, to go forward to what you call the second advent. This kingdom is here." Let any man or woman among you study his or her own personal history, or physical history, and he will find that ever there is the same old, old story, the same rotation of three movements. The curtain rises, and you see a man, a solitary man, one great figure—not two, mind; I do not think He meant two, much less two hundred; you see one solitary man performing one solitary act in the great waste of the universe. Then the curtain falls; and when it rises again it seems all to have come to nothing. Living has become a thing of routine, a thing of convention. We sleep and rise night and day, as if there never had been a man. Then the curtain falls once more; and when it rises anew, later, there appears a wonder in heaven and earth; for behold the first morning has all come back with healing in its wings.

THE INDIVIDUAL AS PROCESS STARTER.

Now, let me try to work out this typical kingdom of Christ; I do not think it has been looked upon in this light. Our Lord says that every providence in your life and mine, physical and historical, begins with an individual man. We are rather startled by the anti-climax; it seems a small thing. We should have expected Him to say: "So is the kingdom of God as if a great mountain were cast into the sea." "So is the kingdom of God as if a foaming cataract were to descend from heaven." "So is the kingdom of God as if the car of Juggernaut were to move along, crushing every opposing force before it"; but a man, a biped of a few inches, to inaugurate any process whatever in the universe; it seems a marvelous thing. And yet, if you look attentively, I think you will find that our Lord is here speaking from experience, and that really all the movements of life, your individual and the historical life of the world, begin with an individual, one individual man, or woman, or child.

Suppose you take up a daily newspaper to-morrow morning, and read such words as these in the editor's summary: "We understand, by advices received from the borders of Persia, at the confluence of the old year and the new, a young man went out to look at the stars." Would you not say, "Since this Boer war came to an end, surely the news has become rather scanty, and there is nothing to fill the columns of the newspapers?" Yet this is the inauguration of something that is far greater than the Boer war, or any number of wars put together. It was the first act of the Old Testament drama, and Max Muller says it is absolutely historical. At the confluence of the old and new year of the world, a young man went out to look at the stars—that simple event! That young man was Abraham. He looked at the stars, and they lighted a match within him—the sense of God—and it went over into Egypt, it passed the Red Sea, it passed the desert, it passed the Jordan, it passed the cities of the plain, it passed through Babylonia, through Persia, through Greece, through Egypt again, through Syria, through Rome. And then it was lighted again at its own embers, they were not dead—lighted by a torch that has never died.

Look again. There are two words in Greek for a man—aner and anthropos. Aner means a distinguished man; anthropos means an obscure, commonplace man. Would you believe it, the word here is anthropos, a commonplace, obscure man, who meant, at the time he was obscure and a nobody, to risk something—for that is what I take to be understood by casting seed into the ground—to risk something. And I put it to any one, looking back to any turning point, if you cannot trace it to some obscure individual that risked something?

Oh, our lives have all been fashioned by a single individual, by a man. What is that stopping the way of Pharaoh's daughter? "Oh, it is only a wretched child, taken out of the Nile River. I would advise your royal highness to have nothing to do with it. It comes from a disgraceful race, who keep the Sabbath, and everything else they can lay their hands on." "No," she says, "I will have something to do with it. I want to see what can be made of waifs and strays of society." And so she takes up this little child, all reeking from the pollution and ordure of the Nile River, and this nameless woman, for she has no place in the Pyramids, has done a deed the influence of which will last forever. You have got up the hill yourselves, do not be conceited. Remember the blood of Christ is behind you in the shape of mothers and sisters and nurses and teachers who have wrestled for you until the breaking of the day, and have refused to let you go until they have blessed you; and who have elected to remain down in the valley, in obscurity, that all the glory may be yours. And you, William Shakespeare, when you sit down to write your "Midsummer Night's Dream," remember the blood of Christ is behind you. Remember how somebody helped you to London when you were stranded at Stratford; remember how somebody, unknown to fame, made a hole in the wall through which you soared to liberty.

THE DANGER OF THE MIDDLE STAGE.

I come to the second stage. The second time the curtain rises it is a disappointment. It all seems to have come to nothing; to have become a thing of mere convention. We sleep and rise night and day. It is the routine of ordinary recurring duties, which seems to leave no room for a sunbeam from heaven or a revelation of any kind. Life has become a mere routine. For the kingdom of Christ, I am afraid of middle things. There are three stages. I am never afraid of number one or of number three, but I am afraid always of number two. I am not afraid of the beautiful, glorious morning; I am not afraid of the evening, the silent, majestic evening; but I am afraid of two o'clock. I am afraid of the time when the heart is low. I hear a great many people talk about the dangers of youth, about the heat and passion and excitement in the way of the young. I tell you I never knew any man go wrong in my life but that it was the loss of youth. It is the loss of youth that causes every man to go wrong. It is when the heat subsides, the passion cools, when excitement is not there; it is when the heart is low that I tremble for a youth.

LIFE'S NEW MORNING.

All at once the resurrection comes. The first morning wakes anew. The seed springs up, we cannot tell how. Longfellow says, we shot an arrow into the air; it fell to earth. We said it was dead, buried, obliterated. Long years afterwards we found that arrow, all unbroken, under an oak tree. We breathed a song into vacant space: we said it was dead, evaporated: long years afterwards, we found that song, from beginning to close, in the heart of a friend where it had been simmering all the time, and coming to a climax.

Or to take a more common instance. You go out under the flaming gas lights. You see a face ghastly under these lights; it is a young girl; she is destitute. She has been trying all the doors of life in vain; she is starving, and she is going to put an end to it, going to drown herself. You give her a coin and a kind word, and she thinks she will not go to-night, she will try the doors once more. The next morning she has a dim remembrance of you and the coin, but she has an upward-springing tendency that she cannot explain, and she tries again; and by God's grace the only river she will ever go to is the river the streams whereof make glad the city of our God. My dear friends, when you sow your seed for Christ, I would not have you discouraged, although it seems to come to nothing and bear no fruit. Remember unconscious cerebration. You painted a picture some years ago. It was received with acclamation; it became the rage. And now it is sold, and everybody has forgotten. But do you think that those who have forgotten your picture are no longer influenced by it? If you walk along the ridge of a hill you will almost certainly forget the mountain pass by which you went up. What then? Are you not up? The road helped you, and left you, but it left you in glory; it left you basking in the sunbeams, and inhaling the freshness of the upper air. Many a one has heard a sermon that thrilled him. It has made him feel as if he would never forget it; and in a week he forgot not only the symbols and heads, but the very text and the name of the minister that preached it. What then? Has that minister's word been in vain? No; you have been lifted up the hill. It is the mountain pass that is gone; let it go. There is something remains, broader and truer, and that is the unconscious cerebration that is independent of all memory. There have been many romantic walks of our youth that are now built up in geography. You cannot even remember them; but still these walks are blooming in unconscious cerebration. The flowers are there still, the roots of the daisies are there still, and they are making the heart glad, you cannot tell how. I would say to you, do not be distressed though the seed you have sown for Christ should seem to have come to nothing. Sow that seed and fall asleep; not the sleep of recklessness, not the sleep of carelessness, not the sleep of despair that has given up the game as lost; but that calm, shall I not say that careful sleep, which has lain like John on the bosom of the Master, which has cast all its care upon One whom it knows will bring it all right at last. Sleep through the days intervening; and one bright morning when you wake, you will go to the window, and look out, expecting to see only what yesterday you saw; and lo, you start back with a cry of glad surprise, for the arrow that you shot into the air is lying unbroken at the foot of a tree; and the song which you breathed into vacant space is simmering in the heart of a friend. And in the place where the thorn grew, the fir tree is springing; and in the place where the briar grew, the myrtle is springing. In the barren sweep of desolation the wilderness is breaking forth into singing, and the desert is rejoicing and blossoming as the rose, and over the vast field of yesterdays the kingdom of God has come.—“The Watchman” (Boston).

The International Lesson.

THIRD QUARTER.

LESSON V.

SEVENTH MONTH 31, 1904.

OMRI AND AHAB.

1 Kings 16: 23-33.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people.—Prov. 14: 34.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Seventh mo. 25.—Omri and Ahab. 1 King 16: 23-33.
Third-day, Seventh mo. 26.—Nadab's reign. 1 Kings 15: 25-31.
Fourth-day, Seventh mo. 27.—Baasha's reign. 1 Kings 15: 33 to 16: 7.
Fifth-day, Seventh mo. 28.—Elah and Zimri. 1 Kings 16: 8-22.
Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 29.—The majesty of God. Psa. 96.
Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 30.—The righteous and the ungodly. Psa. 1.
First-day, Seventh mo. 31.—The true God. Acts 17: 22-31.

Time.—Omri came to the throne 887 B. C. and reigned 12 years—six years in Tirzah and six in Samaria. Ahab came to the throne, according to the revised chronology, 876 B.C., and reigned 22 years.

Contemporary Rulers.—In Judah, Asa; in Syria, Benhadad II.; in Moab, Mesha; in Tyre and Sidon, Ethbaal (Ithobal).

Prophets.—Azariah and Hanani in Judah; Jehu, sometimes in Israel and sometimes in Judah; Elijah in Israel.

While Judah under Asa was growing stronger and better, Israel under Nadab and Baasha, Elah and Zimri was leaving the true religion and was torn by civil war. At length Omri, a general, was able, by means of the army, to seize the throne of Israel. Though little is told about him, it is clear that he was an able man.

23. “In the thirty and first year of Asa.” B.C. 876. “Tirzah.” Rehoboam's capital, a few miles north of Shechem.

24. “The hill Samaria.” This is the first historic mention of the place. The hill was about 300 or 400 feet high and admirably suited for defense. Samaria remained the capital of Israel until the captivity. “Shemer.” Samaria is derived from this name. “Two talents of silver.” About $4,000 nominally, but really very much more, as money had then a far greater purchasing power than now—possibly $400,000 would come nearer the actual value.

25. “Wrought evil.” “Did that which was evil.” Revised Version. In what Omri's wickedness especially consisted we are not informed. There is a reference in Micah (6: 16) which says: “The statutes of Omri are kept,” which would seem to imply that some evil religious practices were introduced or enjoined. This is strengthened by the fact that he brought about a marriage between his son Ahab and Jezebel, the daughter of the King of Tyre.

26. “In the way of Jeroboam.” Compare 1 Kings 15: 26; 34; 16: 19. “Provoke the Lord . . . to anger.” To indignation against the sins.

27. “The book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel.” Not the “Chronicles” in the Bible, but the official records kept by the kings of Israel, and which were one of the sources used by the compiler of the books of Kings in the Bible. Omri conquered Moab, he fought successfully against Syria, and maintained his position. Compare 2 Kings 3: 4.

28. “Slept with his fathers.” Died, a common expression. (1 Kings 2: 10; 11: 43; 14: 20.)

29. “Thirty and eight years.” 876 B. C. Ahab's sister, Athaliah, was married to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah.

30. “Above all that were before him.” Ahab has come down in history as the most wicked of the kings of Israel. Omri was worse than those who preceded him, but Ahab was worse even than Omri. The special evil which Ahab wrought was the introduction of the Phenician Baal worship—perhaps the worst worship of antiquity.

31. “He took to wife.” She was the source of his most evil acts. “Jezebel.” Probably the same name as Isabel. “Zidonians.” Inhabitants of Sidon and Tyre. “Baal.” Probably there were local “Baals”; in this case it was Melkarth, the chief god of Tyre. The rites with which this god was worshipped were evil and licentious in the extreme. It was not unnatural that Ahab should yield to his able wife and her father, whose friendship he was anxious to retain.

32. “An altar for Baal,” etc. Jezebel might reasonably ask for a place where she might worship her gods. “The house of Baal.” Probably a temple of considerable size, for we hear later of 450 priests. (1 Kings 18: 19.) “In Samaria.” The new capital which Omri had founded and built.

33. “And Ahab made the Asherah.” Revised Version. The Authorised Version says, “A grove,” but modern scholars are agreed that the Hebrew word means wooden posts or pillars, which were carved, often to suggest licentious practices. These pillars were often set up in or near groves, which were convenient places in which to carry on the rites. There is a difference of opinion in regard to what god they appertained, but none in regard to the evil which they suggested and in whose honor they were raised. The totem poles of Alaska are analogous religious emblems. “Ahab did yet more to provoke the Lord.” Solomon had allowed his foreign wives to have their worship; Jeroboam had made calves, but it was at least nominally a worship of Jehovah; but Ahab's worship was of the vile gods absolutely—it was idolatry pure and simple.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Expediency has proved the ruin of many.
2. One evil step may lead to terrible consequences.
3. Avoid all known sin.
4. An evil deed on our part may lead others into sin.
5. Asa's course shows that it is possible to overcome evil surroundings.
6. "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

TOPIC FOR SEVENTH MONTH THIRTY-FIRST.

AN EVENING WITH BURMAH AND SIAM.

Isa. 35: 1-10.

Second-day, Seventh mo. 25.—Christ their head. Ps. 18: 43, 44.

Third-day, Seventh mo. 26.—He will conquer. Ps. 45: 3-7.

Fourth-day, Seventh mo. 27.—He will judge. Ps. 72: 2-11.

Fifth-day, Seventh mo. 28.—Above all kings. Ps. 89: 27-37.

Sixth-day, Seventh mo. 29.—A "root of Jesse." Isa. 11: 10-12.

Seventh-day, Seventh mo. 30.—His messenger. Isa. 52: 7-12.

In Burmah and Siam, as in other of these Eastern mission fields, Buddhism is one of the chief obstacles in the way of the acceptance of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Fifteen hundred years ago a Buddhist missionary came to Burmah from Ceylon, made a convert of the king and gave to the people a moral code which has many valuable precepts. Buddhism also gave them a religious literature and forms of speech capable of expressing religious ideas and a system of education, principally for instruction in their sacred writings. Yet "it is a significant fact that the tribes who were never won over to Buddhism are tenfold better prepared to receive the teachings of Christianity than were the Burmans, steeped in Buddhist philosophy."

A religion of self-righteousness and of self-concern—one that inculcates the ideal of personal attainment and credit, until at last Nirvana is reached, is hard to supplant with one of loving service, and of salvation by faith, and of an endless activity in joyful existence in the presence of One who offers Himself as Saviour and not merely as example. Yet among the Burmans the work grows, so that among its four or five millions of people there are perhaps a hundred thousand who name Christ as Lord, a very considerable part of whom are converts from Buddhism.

In North Burmah live the Shans, an ancient tribe related to the Chinese, among whom are three stations opened in the last decade of the nineteenth century, each beginning on absolutely virgin soil, yet each boasting within less than ten years from its foundation a native Christian church, supporting its own pastor, a growing mission school for the training of helpers, and a wide range of evangelistic work. Such results, however, were only possible because of years of preparation of native workers among the Shans, lower Burmah, preparation of Bible translations and choice hymns, and a wide knowledge of methods and plans for beginning work as soon as the later field was opened.

In Siam, with its ten million people, much the same spiritual conditions exist as in Burmah, and withal a fettering of custom, so that, after a most patient and respectful hearing, with every mark of interest, an audience will break up with the words, "What you say is excellent; it warms our hearts to hear it, but it is not the custom of this land."

Yet "Jesus Christ men" are being won among them, their very superstitions and the cruelties resulting therefrom sometimes driving the harassed victims to the mission stations for safety, where they often learn the better refuge of the "Rock of Ages."

THE WINONA LAKE CONFERENCE.

One hundred years ago the Church of Christ in America had no missionaries in the heathen lands. In 1806, the first missionary society on American soil was formed at a haystack near Williams College. In 1886 the Student Volunteer Movement was launched at Mt. Hermon, Mass. Later the need of an organization to develop the church into a missionary church which would properly back up the missionaries on the field was felt; and in July, 1902, the Young People's Missionary Movement was formed for that purpose. The Executive of the "Movement" is composed of the young people's secretaries of thirteen denominational missionary boards of America.

This "Movement" annually holds conferences for young people's leaders, one of which convened at Winona Lake, Ind., June 17th to 26th. One hundred and eight persons attended the conference, of whom three were Friends.

The regular daily program was as follows: At 9 a.m. the conference divided into two Bible classes. One of these studied different passages of the Bible devotionally, under W. J. Erdman, of Germantown, Pa.; the other, a normal Bible class, conducted by E. D. Soper, of Madison, N. J., studied the Passion Week of the life of Christ, each member making a harmony of the Gospels for this period for himself.

The next hour of the morning was devoted to a conference on practical methods of developing an interest in missions, led by Harry Wade Hicks, of Boston, assistant secretary of the A. B. C. F. M. At these conferences the following subjects were profitably discussed: The organization, preparation and duties of the missionary committee; the importance of missionary libraries, methods of securing them and of getting them read; tested methods of securing scriptural habits of giving; importance of and methods of conducting profitable missionary meetings; the growing importance of the mission study class and tested methods of organizing and conducting the same; the strategic importance of the Sunday School as a field for missionary training, and practical ways of using this opportunity; the work of city, district and State committees and other supervisory agencies; and the importance and promotion of prayer for missions.

During the last period of the morning two normal mission study classes were conducted. The foreign mission study class, led by E. H. Dutton, assistant secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, studied "Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom," a book written by John H. De Forest, of Japan, on that country, which is the book to be studied by the young people's societies this winter. The mission study class in home missions, under the leadership of Don O. Shelton, associate secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, studied "Heroes of the Cross in America," a book now under preparation by Shelton, to be used by the young people's societies as a mission study text book during the winter of 1904-5.

An interesting and instructive exhibit of maps, charts, text books, tracts, etc., of practical value in arousing the missionary spirit, was open of afternoons.

Missionary addresses were the usual program of the evening. Among those who addressed the conference were the following: Bishop F. W. Warne, of India; J. Campbell White, formerly of Calcutta; G. F. Draper, of Japan; Grace C. Glenn, formerly of Japan; Robert E. Speer, of New York; Luther D. Wishard, of Chicago; W. M. Bell, of Dayton, O.; F. G. Coan, of Persia; Harry Monroe, superintendent of Pacific Garden Mission, Chicago; Fay Chi Ho and Kung Hsiang Hsi, the subjects of the book, "Two Heroes of Cathay," and F. D. Gamewell, the missionary in charge at the British Legation during the siege of Peking.

One was impressed with the fact that the conference was exceedingly practical and permeated with the Spirit of Christ.

It is the earnest prayer of the Friends who attended this conference that several of our denomination may attend these conferences, as they are held in different parts of the country.

Educational.

WHITTIER COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

Whittier College celebrated its first commencement Sixth month 15th. This event had been long anticipated. In order to accommodate the people a large tent, capable of holding 1,000 people, had been placed on the grounds. The exercises throughout the week attracted large audiences, and in connection with each there was a general expression of satisfaction.

A class of four had completed the college course and were given the degree of B.A.

The commencement address was delivered by Dr. Augustus T. Murray, of Stanford University. It was a thoughtful plea for the development of genuine and substantial character and a criticism of a prevailing tendency to worship bigness.

Following the commencement exercises, about 300 Friends and citizens sat down to a well-prepared banquet, after which there were several brief addresses, presenting various phases of educational work in a very interesting way.

Correspondence.

TO MEMBERS OF WESTERN YEARLY MEETING AND INTERESTED FRIENDS:

The Bible School and Christian Endeavor Assembly of Western Yearly Meeting will be held at Paoli, Ind., Eighth month 9th to 11th. Benjamin F. Trueblood, Mrs. Lamoreaux and other able workers will be present and take part in the program.

Friends at Paoli will give lodging and breakfast free to all visiting delegates.

In addition to the assembly this region has several natural wonders well worth the trip. Merengo Cave, a rival of the noted Wyandott, and but recently discovered, is only fifteen miles away. The French Lick and West Baden Springs, the most noted resort in the Middle West, is only ten miles away.

Those wishing entertainment should send their names to J. J. Copeland.

GEORGE H. MOORE.

Paoli, Ind.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Having removed from Muscatine, Iowa, to this place on account of the great benefit to my wife's health, which she has experienced by a year's sojourn in this mountain climate, I wish to call the attention of any Friends who may be contemplating a like change, to this place, where there are many advantages for the new comer, both in city and surrounding country. Many having throat or lung troubles are greatly benefited by a change to this climate.

The city of Boulder, having a population of about eight thousand, is situated very close to the foothills of the Rocky Mountain range, with a beautiful mountain stream passing through it, thirty miles north of Denver, on the Colorado and Southern Railroad, with five trains daily each way. The State University is located here. My object in writing this is to call the attention of Friends to the fact that a monthly meeting of Friends has been established here; small as yet, but increasing in interest and numbers. This with two other monthly meetings, viz., Denver and Paonia, will make request to Iowa Yearly Meeting that a quarterly meeting be established, to be opened at this place in Ninth month next.

Is it not well for Friends making a change to seek a location where a meeting is already established?

I should be glad to correspond with any who may desire information I might be able to give.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Noticing by the report of the Friends' African Industrial Mission that Arthur B. Chilson stated that the work of the mission, and especially their building would be very much facilitated if they had a molder and mortiser, and knowing the value of two such machines in ordinary house building, I felt a deep concern that I might help answer his and other prayers for them. Accordingly, I laid the matter before my employer, Tho. P. Egan, and he was kind enough to make the two machines for about half their real worth, and the committee was pleased to accept. The machines have been ordered, and will soon be shipped. But this puts an additional cost on the committee of $300, and I told them I would take the responsibility of helping to raise it. T. P. Egan is not a member of our church, but when he is willing to give so much I thought we ought to be willing and able to supply the rest. I know you are asked for money every day, but cannot some who read this send a little to Emma D. Malone, 702 East Prospect Street, Cleveland Ohio, to help raise the $300, trusting our Heavenly Father will put it into your hearts to give for the success of the Friends' African Industrial Mission.

I remain, yours in the cause,
C. ARTHUR BEWLY.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Thomas Newlin is well settled in Chicago, where he is enjoying his work in the university.

Alta Howard, a graduate of Friends' University, '04, will do pastoral work in Stanwood Monthly Meeting, near McLouth, Kansas, for a few weeks.

Since our last report the improvement noted in Dr. R. H. Thomas has not been maintained. Still it is hoped that a continued residence in the mountains may be beneficial.

Friendsville Quarterly Meeting, Wilmington Yearly Meeting, will hold their mid-summer gathering at Friendsville, Tenn., from the 21st to the 24th inst. A good program has been arranged.

Lydia Pearson, of Duck Creek Monthly Meeting, Ind., is laboring in North Carolina. Excellent reports come from her efforts in Rich Square. She is now visiting families in Randolph County.

Albert E. Wright, of Earlham, Iowa, has declined an invitation to remain there as pastor another year, feeling the necessity of seeking a warmer climate. He will probably go to California this fall.

Prof. Francis K. Jones, of Pacific College, with his wife and child, are at the home of his parents, Tonganoxie, Kansas. Their visit was hastened by the sickness of his mother, Mary Jones, who has been sick for several weeks. She is in a very critical condition.

The Bible School at Monkton Ridge, Vt., was reorganized the 10th inst. Alfred B. Miles was selected for superintendent, and eight new teachers were secured. James Renfrew and wife, of Bingham, Me., have been called to the meeting, and will move into the new "home for the minister" in the near future.

R. E. Herron, Clifton, Col., is an isolated Friend in the southwestern section of that State, who writes encouragingly about the locality, and desires other Friends to move into the community. Friends who feel drawn to that section of the country would do well to correspond with him.

Samuel Beeson writes from Middleton, Idaho, Seventh month 6th that "the name of Boise, Idaho, Monthly Meeting has been changed from Boise to New Hope. As the meeting is now held in the country, eighteen miles from Boise, we thought best to change the name. We have received into membership one or more persons at each meeting for six months."

New Garden Quarterly Meeting, held at Guilford College, the 9th inst., in its session on ministry and oversight, was at once introduced into a living concern to do more than simply exist. The call seemed to be "to grow," "to enlarge." So strong did this exercise become that the meeting adjourned to further consider the matter eight days later in Greensboro. The meeting for worship was more largely attended than usual, and the exhortations followed the line of the concern felt in the meeting on ministry and oversight. After dinner, in the shade of the trees, the business meeting proceeded with life and dispatch. The written reports from the various committees, on the different subjects requiring reports at the end of our church year, were considered, and directed to be condensed and forwarded to yearly meeting. The statistical and other reports were more nearly accurate than any before secured. The finances were reported to be in good shape. Love and life seemed to be the moving hopeful spring of the meeting. No ministers outside of the quarter were present. Six inside the quarter were.

The following items were culled from the Whittier, Cal., "Register" of the 8th inst.:

"The excavating for the addition to the college is about completed and work on the superstructure will begin soon. Contractor V. A. Reynolds, who will oversee the work, has ordered 10,000 feet of flooring."

"Levi D. Barr, of Los Angeles, well known to Whittier people, will deliver an address under the auspices of the Prohibition Alliance at the Free Methodist Church, Tuesday evening, July 12th, at 7.30 o'clock. His subject will be, "Five Fundamental Pillars of American Civilization."

On Fifth month 24th, Sylvester Jones and Charles C. Haworth went on horseback from Holguin to a place nine miles out, where one of the Holguin members has a store in a village of 300 people. Their meeting that night was well attended for a rainy night, as it proved to be. Charles would like to continue work there. Sylvester Jones went on to where two young Friends, Noah K. Williams and Luther Hill, have started industrial work and are putting up a saw mill, and held a meeting with their people the next night—a rare opportunity for them. It is believed important to open regular mission work before very long at a place near by there, on the Cuban Central Railway.

The missionaries have opened regular work in the village of Auras, 1,500 people, on the railway connecting Gibara and Holguin, about midway between them. They had several times held religious services there before and found a receptive community. Now they have rented a house and will hold meetings etc., every two weeks, under charge, at present, of Charles C. Haworth, assisted by the other missionaries at Holguin. On Sixth month 17th, after pastoral visiting during the day by Charles and Orpha Haworth, their meeting in the evening, the second regular meeting there, was attended by two hundred people, respectful and attentive listeners to the preaching of the gospel. There are at least three other villages within four to eight miles of Auras that could well be served by the same missionaries if there were some stationed at Auras, and that field is ripe for harvest. More laborers are greatly needed.

THE COLORADO ASSEMBLY OF FRIENDS.

The Colorado Assembly of Friends opened Sixth month 23d. Representatives were present from each monthly meeting. We were much favored in having with us so many ministers—six being present on Sabbath—which is a rare occurrence for these far-away Western meetings. W. J. Hadley was present throughout, and gave much valuable information and gospel teaching, treating the following subjects: "Friends in History," "Peace," "Secret Societies," and "Baptism and Communion."

L. Maria Dean gave three very helpful Bible lessons on the "Tabernacle."

John Fry gave a very interesting lesson on the "Plan of the Ages."

On Fifth-day evening we were greatly favored with a lecture by Dr. Bailey, pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church of Denver. Subject, "Some of the Mysteries of Common Things."

On Sixth-day evening we listened with much interest to J. G. Kennedy, pastor of Boulevard United Presbyterian Church of Denver on "Comparative Study of the Four Gospels." The services of these brothers from sister churches were greatly appreciated.

Other subjects discussed were: "Social Life of the Church," L. E. Kenworthy; "Colorado as a Field for Friends," M. Z. Kirk; "How to Study the Bible," Lola Hobson; "Relation of the Pastor to the Church," George D. Weeks; "Relation of the Church to the Pastor," E. Jones.

On Sabbath morning W. P. S. Cattell gave a Sabbath School blackboard exercise, which was interesting to older ones as well as children. Following this occurred the regular meeting for worship, at which W. J. Hadley preached with great power. On Sabbath evening Ella Veeter, from California Yearly Meeting, preached.

This closed four days of very helpful and instructive meetings.

SICK DOCTOR.

Proper Food Put Him Right.

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness, and when needing nourishment the worst way, is valuable:

"An attack of grip so severe it came near making an end of me left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day, and for two weeks this was almost my only food; it tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing I was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"At the present time I am preparing a paper for two medical journals in which I mention my own case and speak particularly of Grape-Nuts, great value as food to sustain life during serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians will save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Absolutely the most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts ten days proves.

There's a reason.

mater, also celebrated him during its commencement week.

England and Germany have now concluded an arbitration treaty similar to those already concluded by England with France, Italy and Spain. It will be remembered that the treaties of this character provide for the arbitration of questions of a legal nature, especially those relating to the interpretation of other treaties. They are excellent so far as they go, and that their general influence makes for peace and fair dealing cannot be doubted.

The formal election for the President of the Republic of Mexico took place the 11th inst. The Electors announced the election of Porfirio Diaz as President and Ramon Corral as Vice-President. Corral will, in the near future, be the real President, for President Diaz is aging rapidly and is feeling the strain of office. He intends to retire in reality, though he will nominally be President. In doing this he will be relieved of the arduous duties of office, and will at the same time satisfy the people.

No settlement of the questions pending between the Republic of Panama and the authorities of the canal zone has been reached. The Panama Government is firm in the belief that the only correct interpretation of the treaty is that until the canal is constructed all parts of the Isthmus are under the direct jurisdiction of Panama. However, the fact that the relations between the Panama Government and Major General Davis, Governor of the canal zone, are very cordial, leads the people of the Republic to hope that the questions at issue will be satisfactorily settled.

The Southern planters will heartily rejoice if it shall prove true that an ant has been discovered in Guatemala which is the mortal enemy of the boll weevil. Just when the cotton growers have despaired of discovering any means of checking the ravages of the bug that has wrought such immense injury to the crops in Texas and elsewhere, O. F. Cook, of the Department of Agriculture, discovers the possibilities of the Guatemalan ant, which may, if he does the same work in Texas that he does in Central America, entirely wipe out the cotton pest and save the growers millions upon millions of dollars.

The French Chamber has adjourned for the summer holidays, and will not meet again until Tenth month. The existence of the government is consequently assured until that date. Even M. Clemenceau, however, who is the leader of the bloc, has expressed the conviction that the Ministry must fall as soon as the Chamber reassembles. The explanation is that the Ministry has pledged itself on repeated occasions to introduce, the first thing next session, a long-promised scheme of income tax. In the inner circles of parliamentary life it is universally recognized that no income tax is possible in France, as it would supply too easy an electoral platform to the aggressive demagogues, who would constantly be proposing higher and higher rates of progressive taxation of incomes until all capital would be driven out of the country.

The fears expressed in regard to the Russian harvest are confirmed by reports from various provinces. The harvest in Bessarabia is almost a complete failure. The price of stock has risen, and, in consequence of the decline in wages and the number of laborers who have gone to seek work outside of the province, the residents of the communes of Bacheuri and Ismailsk have petitioned the Governor to allow them to postpone payment of taxes. Many of the corn cultivators are reduced almost to beggary. In the province of Kieff the Governor has instructed the local authorities to take all possible precautions against famine. Frosts have seriously injured the crops. Fruit and vegetables in Kharhoff Province suffered severely from frost and rain. In the western Province of Moghileff many peasants are begging, and the official journal of the province complains of a large increase in theft.

A LA CARTE DINING CAR SERVICE ON THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

To still further accommodate its patrons, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has established the a la carte system of dining car service for breakfast and luncheon on several of its most popular trains.

A la carte breakfast is served on the Federal Express leaving Philadelphia at 6.35 a.m. daily for Washington, and on the Cleveland and Cincinnati Express leaving New York at 8.25 p.m. daily for Pittsburg.

A la carte luncheon is served on trains leaving Philadelphia for New York at 11.00 a.m. weekdays, 12.35 p.m. Sundays only, and 1.00 p.m. weekdays; on train leaving New York for Philadelphia at 12.55 p.m. weekdays; on train leaving Pittsburg for Philadelphia at 12.01 p.m. daily, and on the coach section of train leaving New York at 1.55 p.m. daily for Pittsburg and the West.

A la carte breakfast and luncheon are served on the Manhattan Limited leaving Pittsburg at 3.35 a.m. daily for New York.

All dinners on Pennsylvania Railroad dining cars, and all other meals, except those mentioned above, are table d'hôte.

While there are indications that the movement in favor of a "sane and safe" observance of the Fourth is meeting with some success, however, the casualties reported this year from the various cities of the country still make a formidable showing. The Chicago "Tribune," which prepares an annual list of deaths and accidents occurring on Independence Day, calculates that 52 persons were killed and 3,049 injured this year.

More than 45,000 employees in the great packing houses of Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha and other places struck, the 12th inst. The strikers ask that a uniform scale of 18½ cents per hour be paid for unskilled labor. They say this is not a request for an increase of wages, but a protest against a decrease. On the other hand, the employers state that "we consider the demand of the union for an advance in wages of unskilled labor entirely unwarranted by industrial conditions. We could not concede it, and

A BACK LICK

Settled the Case with Her.

Many great discoveries have been made by accident, and things better than gold mines have been found in this way; for example, when even the accidental discovery that coffee is the real cause of one's sickness proves of most tremendous value because it locates the cause, and the person has then a chance to get well.

"For over 25 years," says a Missouri woman, "I suffered untold agonies in my stomach, and even the best physicians disagreed as to the cause without giving me any permanent help, different ones saying it was gastritis, indigestion, neuralgia, etc., so I dragged along from year to year, always half sick, until finally I gave up all hopes of ever being well again.

"When taking dinner with a friend one day she said she had a new drink which turned out to be Postum, and I liked it so well I told her I thought I would stop coffee for awhile and use it, which I did.

"So for three months we had Postum in place of coffee without ever having one of my old spells, but was always healthy and vigorous instead.

"Husband kept saying he was convinced it was coffee that caused those spells, but even then I wouldn't believe it until one day we got out of Postum, and as we lived two miles from town I thought to use the coffee we had in the house.

"The result of a week's use of coffee again was that I had another terrible spell of agony and distress, proving that it was the coffee and nothing else. That settled it, and I said good-bye to coffee forever, and since then Postum alone has been our hot meal-time drink.

"My friends all say I am looking worlds better and my complexion is much improved. All the other members of our family have been benefited, too, by Postum in place of the old drink, coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee or tea is the wise thing for every coffee drinker. Such a trial tells the exact truth often where coffee is not suspected.

proposed to submit the question to arbitration, which the union declined to do." This strike, if prolonged, will probably cause an increase in the price of beef, and may eventually end in a meat famine.

Secretary of State Hay has been decorated by President Loubet, of France, with the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, in recognition of the services rendered by Secretary Hay in the last six years toward the maintenance of the peace of the world. The Secretary of State, who has hitherto declined all propositions of this nature, felt that he could not refuse so signal an honor from the great European Republic, considering the motive which prompted it. He thereupon sent to the French Embassy a note expressing his grateful appreciation of the offer, which he accepted, subject to the approval of Congress.

Silas C. Swallow, of Harrisburg, Pa., was selected as the candidate for President, and George W. Carroll, of Beaumont, Texas, as candidate for Vice-President by the recent National Prohibition Convention, which met in Indianapolis. Dr. Swallow has long been connected with Prohibition and Prohibitionists. Several years ago he became prominent as the writer of articles exposing Pennsylvania politicians, and soon afterward he himself became a candidate for office on the Prohibition ticket. He polled over 100,000 votes for State Treasurer in 1897, and the year following he ran for Governor, and again polled a vote of over 100,000. The platform adopted by the convention contains, in addition to its expression of unalterable hostility to the liquor traffic, several planks which are held in some quarters to betoken a broadening policy. These new planks declare in favor of placing the tariff question in the hands of a commission, of the election of the United States Senators by the people, of the honest administration of the civil service laws, and of the recognition of the fact that the right of suffrage should depend upon the mental and moral qualifications of the citizen.

FAIR FOLKS

Don't Blame Nature, but Investigate.

Many claim they are nervous "by nature," when it is really only because they are slaves to the coffee or tea habit, and this is easily proved by cutting out the coffee or tea for ten days and using well-boiled Postum Food Coffee instead—then comes the change.

"I seemed endowed by nature with a nervous constitution," says a lady of Knoxville, Tenn., "and, although I felt tea and coffee were bad for me, the force of habit was so strong I just couldn't give them up.

"Some one suggested that I try cereal coffee, but I remembered what insipid drinks we used under that name during the Civil War, and so, without ever looking into the subject or realizing what progress science has made in this direction, I just wouldn't give Postum a trial, until finally the W. C. T. U. in our city started an exchange where there were so many calls for Postum it was served regularly, and many were thus induced to try it, myself among the number. How delighted I was to find it so agreeable, delicious and satisfying. As I had suffered from nervous prostration, a change from tea and coffee was imperative, but all these troubles disappeared after I had used the Postum faithfully for a few weeks.

"A sister and a son-in-law were converted to Postum at the same time, and now we all enjoy it as well as we ever did coffee, but instead of making us nervous like coffee, we enjoy steady nerves, sleep sound and are in every way better for the change." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

This lady found what she thought was natural nervousness was only due to an acquired taste for coffee that is to some people a sure destroyer of nerves and health. Like her, any one who cuts off coffee altogether and uses well-boiled Postum in its place will be greatly benefited after a few days, and the return to health is a joyful journey.

There's a reason.

THE HEART OF THE MESSAGE.

IN THE Klondike gold fields, on the very outposts of civilization, there are many young fellows who have run away from home and left behind them broken-hearted mothers. These boys have plunged into the wild life of the camp, the excitement of "prospecting," the fever of gambling, and the freedom of a lawless society. But for some reason they are not happy. As soon as they let themselves think, or whenever they are alone and a silence comes over them, the mind travels back to the old home. They condemn their own lives and are conscious that they have spoiled the happiness of the home where their early lives were passed in innocence and joy. In the memory of one sad face, they do not enjoy being outcasts.

Some day a letter comes into camp and the receiver of it recognizes the handwriting, only grown more trembly. He quietly slips out of the crowd of boisterous men and sits on the bank of a little brook, and now he opens the letter from home. There is very little news in it—a few items about the changes in the neighborhood, the record of a few recent graves. Then he comes to the heart of the letter. Not a word about his own waywardness. No scolding for his crooked life. No threats of disinheritance. Just plain, simple words about her love for the boy whom she bore—trembly words which burn into his very soul the suffering and anguish which he is causing that forsaken mother. As he comes to the end of it, it is as though a little window were opened for him to look down into the very heart of his mother, and he feels for the first time in years the warm tears running down his cheeks and a swelling at his throat. The man in him has been reached. He loathes the old life and resolves to start anew.

No type of earth can image the yearning love of God, but something like this mother's heart is the heart of Him who brought us into life and ordained us to be conformed to the likeness of His Son. Letters have come to us from Him telling of His large, divine purposes for us—pleadings and tender calls. Last of all came among us the very express image of His person—One who showed the Father, until those who heard His words and saw His deeds knew that they had found an open Door to the Life and nature of the infinite God. Some few glimpses He has given us of home, some news of the scenery and circumstance of those who live with Him and behold His face. But the real heart of the message is like that other which touched the boy's heart in the Klondike—only deeper, wider, more appealing. From first to last the Gospel tells of a Father's yearning love—that we might be made sons. The last chapter of it ought to melt any man who is spoiling his life in sin and who is clutching the swine-husks in his lean hands. It is the unparalleled story of what sin costs the heart of the Father. The veil is torn away and in the darkness one may see the sacrifice and suffering for sin—not sin in the abstract, but yours and mine. God cares. It makes a difference to Him. How much He cares, how much difference it makes to Him, any one may read at the cross. It is not an empty picture, no passing drama. It is an eternal fact—a letter from home to every wanderer forever. Love follows and watches and suffers. He who sees what this means for him may well cry:

"My Saviour! not deserted!"
"Deserted! who hath dreamt that when the cross in darkness rested, Upon the Victim's hidden face no love was manifested?
What frantic hands outstretched have e'er the atoning drops averted?
What tears have washed them from the soul, that one should be deserted?"

This story of redeeming love is as fresh as when the first eye witness told it. We need it now as much as in the days when the first messengers proclaimed it as the power of God unto salvation. "The All-powerful is the All-loving too." The soul that feels it and knows it and that grasps its meaning will have his cheek wet and will feel the swelling at the throat as he cries out, "My Lord and my God."

A PLEA FOR MORALITY.

WE SOMETIMES hear very earnest and well-meaning Christians speak of "mere morality" as though it was a rather poor article, and so in fact it is. But is "mere religion" any better? There is an anecdote told of a minister who asked an elder what he thought of the sermon which the former had just preached. "Oh," replied the elder, "it was sound." "And what else?" asked the minister. "That is all I can say for it," said the honest elder.

That is exactly the trouble with some persons' religion. They hold a fairly "sound" theory. They have had the proper "experiences." They profess well. Their testimony sounds strong to a stranger who does not know their life. But the real qualities which make a good life, the true moral fiber, are lacking. That is what the phrase "mere religion" means. It is "profession" without possession; it is theory without practice; it is "doctrine" without life. It is a very poor affair indeed—not a bit warmer or better than the rags of self-righteousness which is what is meant by "mere morality."

The country is being shocked almost every day by the moral break-down of some highly professing Christian. Somebody whom everybody trusted proves to be no better or cleaner or holier than the ordinary unprofessing neighbor. "See there! What does religion amount to? With all his odor of sanctity, that man lacks the common morality of a decent heathen. Without any religion we are just as good as he is." This is the natural comment. Every time there is a case of moral break-down of such a sort, it furnishes large capital to the scoffer and the sceptic. His comment is hard to answer. What is such "religion" good for? It isn't good for anything. It isn't religion at all. "Mere religion" is not religion. Religion includes infinitely more than theory and doctrine, altogether more than "experiences" and "testimony"; it is the set of the entire life toward divine ends and purposes. "Put ye on the armor of light" . . . "put on the Lord Jesus Christ and make no provision for the flesh," is Paul's way of telling what religion is. It is the formation of a morally victorious life.

Friends have had the reputation of being just the same inside as they appeared outside, of making practice square with doctrine. But we cannot hope to drift along calmly on such a reputation. We have had enough startling revelations of human weakness and hollowness among us to make us reflect. The cut of the coat, the use of thee and thou, the solemn demeanor, do not of themselves make "saints." Never was the need greater for men and women clad in "the armor of light," with the moral fiber clear through to the core. There are many social evils of an alarming sort about us. All these things are "catching." By an unconscious imitation a man tends to do himself what he sees others doing or what the newspaper reports about others. Before he realizes he is sliding to a lower level. It is the old story; he looks toward Sodom, pitches his tent toward Sodom, and wakes up to find himself in Sodom. There can be no safe compromising with these things —no playing with fire. We must have a revival of moral life and a raising of moral standards. We have had much holiness preaching. Now we want holiness practice. We want home discipline and constant inculcation of the truth that no man or woman is safe until there is formed a sound mind, a clean heart and a good will.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

IDEALS IN LIFE.*

BY AUGUSTUS T. MURRAY.

This occasion is a happy one. We are met, in a sense, to celebrate the coming of age of this institution. Whittier College to-day sends forth her pioneer class, and we rejoice with her and with them over the accomplishment of long-cherished hopes and ambitions. This institution now passes another milestone on her course and takes her place among the honorable sisterhood of American colleges. It is a position of honor and of grave responsibility; for it is to our colleges that we look, in no small degree, to save the State from dangers which menace it, and to keep the standard of American manhood and womanhood high above the mean, the petty and the commonplace.

It is one of our boasts, as Americans, that our common people are at once saner and more alert than is the case in most lands; that they have a keener appreciation of what is going on about them, a more intelligent interest in public affairs; that they desire to advance in the world themselves, and are determined that their children shall; and more than this, they feel that the opportunity to advance is theirs by inalienable right. All this is no idle boast; it is true; it is one of the richest fruits of democracy. We have, indeed, a goodly heritage; and any one who has lived for a time on the continent of Europe can appreciate it to the full.

As a nation we do not enjoy the entire respect of older countries. They stand amazed at our phenomenal development; they look with wonder, not untouched with envy, upon our material prosperity; and they have in recent years come to have a wholesome regard for our strength; but with it all there is often a certain scorn, a sense of their own superiority, a contempt for our crudenesses, our provinciality. But, despite this, we go our way serenely, increasing in wealth and in strength each year, blundering often, sinning even against the light, it may be, wasting our resources, mismanaging our affairs, but still with the utmost confidence that all will be well in the end.

These two facts regarding our American civilization are worthy of serious consideration. It is right that we should recognize the blessings and the privileges to which we are heirs; it is also right—nay, it is our duty—to look with calm and unflinching view at the shortcomings, the blunders, the vices, of our national life. These are many indeed; not all peculiar to us, for human nature is essentially the same the world over, but none the less characteristic and deserving of notice; and it is well that in thinking of the future of this college, of the duty it is to perform, and the place it is to fill, we should consider them. The picture I draw is not meant to seem unduly dark; but I naturally lay stress on those tendencies which this institution should seek to combat.

We then, as a people who in less than a century and a half of national existence have grown from insignificance to greatness, who possess resources so vast as to seem practically limitless, find ourselves only too apt to take bigness as a standard of measurement, a basis of value. This is, of course, not true of all Americans; but we are speaking now of the average man, of the one who would be taken by a foreigner as representative of our people. Taking such a man as a type, we should unquestionably find that this standard of value is his prevailing one. To him the fact that we have become a great nation is itself a proof that our institutions are right in themselves, and that they have been rightly ordered. The business man who has amassed a large fortune is to him a successful man, although this fortune may have been amassed at the cost of the sacrifice of all or nearly all that makes life worth the living. So, too, in national affairs many of our people not only desire bigness; they demand it. Let us have a strong army is their cry; let our navies cover the seas; let our flag wave over distant lands, to show the world that we are indeed great. These things not all of our people desire, but our typical man of the people would probably be found to favor them all. So in our social organization, those who have the greatest wealth, and can make the greatest, and often the most vulgar display, are only too frequently accounted the leaders, and their follies and absurdities, their excesses even, are copied and imitated, as though they merited imitation, and not rather the contempt of all sane minds. Again, in politics, he is accounted successful, who has arisen, by whatever means to a position of influence, and so on.

These things force themselves upon our attention. They are not imaginary. Those of us who are still young have seen vast changes in our American ideals. We have seen our country emerge from its former isolation and take its place side by side with the nations of Europe as a world power. We have seen American armies in Cuba, in Porto Rico, in the Philippines, and in China. We have seen the creation of a navy, great now, and presumably to be vastly increased in the near future. New and alien lands have been added to our republic, some of them without force, but, unhappily, in the case of the Philippines, by actual conquest. Never shall I forget the emotions I felt when I saw a band of forty or fifty students from our own university leave to join the army of invasion, or when, a few weeks later, I saw from the heights of San Francisco a fleet of transports sail westward, bearing that army to a land seven thousand miles from our shores.

It is no part of my purpose to discuss again the merits or the demerits of the war with Spain, or to reopen the mazy question of the Philippines. Whether or not that war was honorable or even justifiable; whether or not the popular view that it was a struggle unselfishly taken up on behalf of a suffering people in a neighboring land can still be held; it is now a matter of history, and its attendant outburst of militarism is something to be reckoned with. Whether one holds that we were right or wrong in the conquest of the Philippines, we have established ourselves as masters of those distant islands, and have suppressed by force of arms those who, failing to recognize our benevolent purposes, regarded us as alien usurpers. It was a strange spectacle, a sad chapter in our history, one which our best citizens wish had never been written; but written it has been, and the results of the Philippine war are again not fictions, but facts to be reckoned with. Omitting, then, all discussion of old questions, concerning which all my hearers doubtless have their own opinions, we must nevertheless note that the events of the last six years have done much to foster the spirit of militarism, and that they tend to illustrate in its baldness the triumph of might. We have long wanted a canal across the isthmus of Panama, and now, because we are strong and the Republic of Colombia is weak, we are to have a canal all our own. True, this is putting the matter bluntly; yet who will deny that, if Colombia had been strong and we weak, recent events on the isthmus could never have transpired. Again, in laying stress upon the fact that we have won the Philippines by force of arms, and having in mind the devastation of those fair islands during the years of the war, the dreadful loss of life, and the barbarities of which we have read, and which we must perforce believe, in part, at least—in all this I recognize that we are giving but one side of the picture. There is another and a brighter side. Cuba is a better land to live in than it was. American energy and American intelligence have done much to stamp out the dreaded fever, and Colonel Waring's life was not laid down in vain. So, too, in the Philippines, sanitary engineers and schools have followed in the path of our armies, and the evil is not altogether unbalanced by good. But what we are concerned with is the indisputable fact that to many of our people might has come to stand above right, and that in our case, as always, war has brought evils in its train. Who shall measure the harm wrought by the stimulus given by this war to men's baser passions? Who shall say how far the war is to blame for an apparently increasing disregard of life and of law in our own land? And not only a contempt for law and a disregard of human life, but now and again an outburst of veritable savagery—the burning of negroes at the stake, and that not in the South alone, where race prejudice is strongest, while in at least one recorded instance excursion trains were run to accommodate spectators. Man is by nature a savage, some say; in war he is even bidden to be such; and the man of war, whose trade is killing, glorified though he has been by orators and poets—yes, by Christian ministers—cannot easily clear himself of responsibility for the savagery which breaks out now and again in our own land.

This, then, we must regard as an ominous sign of the times, as a distinct menace to our republic, the inordinate desire for national greatness, expressed in the spirit of militarism and the triumph of brute force.

Another aspect of this love of bigness, to which I wish to call your attention, is the prevailing tendency to gauge all things by purely commercial standards. We are not by any means a nation of shop-keepers, to use Napoleon's famous phrase, but we are, I fear, a nation of money-getters; and our average American is prone to regard the man who gets money the fastest, or who gets the most money, as the most successful man. It is, of course, in one way an expression of the struggle for existence. The young man, in choosing a profession, chooses not alone according to his individual preference. He looks also to the matter of financial returns; and in a sense he must do so, particularly if he have others dependent upon him. But many choose with reference only to financial returns. To them all the walks of life are simply so many avenues for money-getting. Medicine, law, politics, engineering, teaching—yes, the ministry—simply ways in which the almighty dollar may be won! This is bad in itself; but think of its results. What shall we say of the practitioner who enters the field of medicine with no ideals save these, to whom his profession offers no opportunities for doing good? And what of the lawyer? One may state fearlessly that the hundreds of young men of low ideals who rush into the profession of law, and who are guided in their practice by the desire to make money, and by this alone, do more to foster crime and violence than any other agency at work in our land. They bring disgrace upon a noble profession, and make what should be one of the greatest safeguards of the community little better than an ally of the criminal. And what is to be said of journalism, a profession to which our young men and young women are flocking by hundreds and thousands? What the press might be we know. What it is, we see all too clearly, when men of ability, actuated by a desire to make money, pander to the basest instincts of the community, and make many of our great journals unfit to be seen in our homes. These are not light matters. They show to what the greed for gain has brought us; and it is our shame that the editors of such journals can say in their defence that they but give the public what it wants.

Another side of this same commercial spirit is seen in the unwillingness shown by so many to engage in any disinterested work for the State, for the Church, for any high end. Returns that can be measured in dollars and cents are looked for, and the patient student toiling in his laboratory or his study, spending time and energy in the search for truth—the man who devotes his life to high and unselfish ends—is often counted a failure.

Our people are lovers of success. They do not always rightly gauge success; they do not always look to the means by which it has been won; but they love it for itself. So our young men and young women are energetic, ambitious; they enter upon life's struggle with a desire, a determination to succeed; and this is well. But not rarely the vision is clouded and success is purchased by ignoble means. That office may be won the young man surrenders high principle and buys with money or with promises the support of the corrupt and the corruptible. That wealth may be won he uses public office to further private ends. In law he defends a known criminal and seeks to defeat the ends of justice, in order to win a reputation as a clever pleader and so be in a position to demand large fees. In business he stoops to take advantage of another and to sell him land or stock or what not, known to be worthless. Even in our colleges, in manly sports engaged in by manly fellows, it requires constant alertness on the part of those having these matters in charge, to see that all is indeed manly, straightforward and open. So fierce is the thirst for victory in inter-collegiate contests, so strongly does the team feel that its college demands a victory, that now and again unworthy means are taken to secure it. I have myself more than once seen manifest attempts to injure an opponent on the football field, have even seen a throng of college men, as their team appeared to be losing, call out to their men to do, this very thing, cowardly and unmanly as it is.

I speak of these things, which happily are not universal, because they show tendencies in our American life the very existence of which makes it clear that low ideals prevail among us. I might appeal to the daily press, and ask if there has been a week during this past winter in which we have not read of some glaring instance of dishonesty on the part of some public official or of one holding some other position of trust. For this we Americans must blush. Our public officials—national, State, county and municipal—are in hundreds, perhaps in thousands, of instances corrupt. They have no ideals; they but seek gain; and office is to them a means of getting gain.

My friends, these facts suffice to show how great is the opportunity and how great the responsibility which confront our schools and colleges. If many of our people seem to follow low ideals, seem to lack ideals, it is for our schools and colleges to work—silently, persistently, surely, until the mass is leavened. Upon them rests the high duty of leading the young men and young women of our land to rise above these besetting tendencies of American life, and to cherish high ideals of living in whatever sphere.

The general average of intelligence in our land is high. Our democratic institutions, faultily as they are administered, are justified by their fruits. They tend to create men, not machines; and despite blundering in the conduct of our affairs, we none the less fearlessly assert that the underlying principles of our government are right. Our faith in democracy is firm. Firm, too, is our faith in our school system. This, too, may have its faults. It may, in this locality or that, be administered by men who are incompetent or corrupt; but again we justify it by its fruits. Few, indeed, are the regions in the length and breadth of our land, where a boy or girl grows up without, at least, elementary instruction. Small, indeed, is the percentage of native-born Americans who are illiterate; and we count by millions those who, at State expense, have gone through our high schools, and are ready for college, or for entering with well-trained and well-equipped minds upon business or technical careers. More than that, in many States, especially in our Western States, universities, maintained and equipped by the State, afford facilities for higher education to all who are ready and who care to make use of them. Side by side with these stand similar institutions supported by private endowments, some of which again offer unlimited opportunities without tuition charges.

Great, indeed, is our opportunity. I have spoken of certain influences which Andrew D. White once characterized as a tide of barbarism. To counteract these our colleges stand as bulwarks of civilization, sending forth each year among thousands and tens of thousands of men and women stimulating, elevating, civilizing influences. In the midst of this material age we preach the doctrine of idealism. Not wealth, not power, not influence, is the goal of life, but right living. Material prosperity, purchased by the sacrifice of one's ideals, is but dust and ashes, as many a so-called successful man has come to know. And what is true of the individual is true of the nation. Conquest never yet imparted lasting greatness. It is the development, the training of men that does so. We recognize changed conditions, and that our own country can never return to its former isolation; but, while new occasions teach new duties, the duty of national, as of individual, righteousness changes not nor fades away.

To you, then, young men and young women of Whittier College, especially to those of you who this day receive your diplomas, I bring this message: Cherish your ideals. However rude the shocks you may meet in the larger world which you enter after leaving college, hold fast to the principles of right living, of high-mindedness, which have been taught you here. Fear not to be optimists, but rather rejoice in your faith in God and in humanity. You have been trained to take your stand with those who are combatting the influences which make for unrighteousness, and to let yours make for righteousness. Your alma mater has the right to demand this of you; you owe it to her to show yourselves not unworthy of the diplomas handed you this day.

And more than this: the college not only imparts to one high ideals. It gives him, also, a special training for life's work. This does not consist in a fund of information, an accumulation of facts, many of which your memories are bound to lose, but in a training of the whole man. You have, I trust, learned to think; you have trained yourselves to see clearly, to reason surely; you are in a position to face life's problems and life's duties bravely and unflinchingly. Cherish, I beg of you, honesty of the intellect, as you cherish honesty of life. Then will your training serve you well, wherever you may be placed. You will know how to distinguish the genuine from the sham, the true from the false. There is no royal road to success, as there is no royal road to learning. The college-bred man or woman begins anew on leaving college, and begins, it may be, at the bottom. Hard, painstaking work, and nothing else, brings success; and it should be one of the results of your training that you know this, and are ready to accept it. Carry with you, my friends, as among the richest gifts your college can give you, a sense of the beauty and the nobility of life, high ideals of scholarship, of citizenship, and of conduct, and a readiness of mind to turn with energy to the work before you, however humble that work may be. You will not be led astray by our American love of bigness. You will not use the purely commercial standard of value. Right will ever in your eyes come before might and honor before profit.

In another sense, too, life will be richer for you than for those who have not had these advantages. Besides the special training they impart you have gained from your scientific studies a deeper appreciation of the awe and mystery of universe. The stars and the wild flowers, the mountains and the sea, should mean more to you; for you will see more in them than the untrained eye can see. May they be to you not merely so many illustrations of the mysterious workings of natural laws, but also manifestations of the power and glory of God. And from your literary studies you have gained that which, rightly used, will be a priceless possession—the love of good books. He who has this dwells in the society of the great souls of earth, and communes with them as with familiar friends. Of this friendship no circumstances of life can rob you, not occupation, not isolation, not poverty. Let it never be said of you that absorption in the routine business of life, in the getting of money, makes you dead to the influence of the things of the spirit. Be lovers of the beautiful in art, in nature, and in literature, as you are lovers of the true. For, while we recognize that a disinterested love of truth is the foundation stone of all true culture, the Greeks have taught us what it is to be lovers of the true and of the beautiful as well.

These considerations are general ones. Let me say now that this institution has especial opportunities, especial responsibilities. It is situated in the far West; and in the larger and more liberal life of the West there are peculiar dangers. We rejoice in this freer life; we believe that it tends to develop stronger types of manhood and womanhood; but its very largeness and freedom and vigor give rise to habits of thought and action which need guiding, need tempering. Here in this great State, so fair a spot in which to live, do we not see abundant signs of this? Is there not a deplorable lack of respect for tradition, only too often a lack of respect for law? Is there not a lack of high-mindedness on the part of men in public life? Is it not abundantly evident that this absorption in material things, of which I have spoken, makes our people callous to the gentler, the higher, aspects of life?

Against these things Whittier College will take a firm stand, and from her will go out influences which will make for the development of higher standards. For the college which merely imparts instruction, even though it be of the highest type, fails to perform its duty. It is not knowledge that saves; it is character; and the function of the college is to train men and women for the highest duties of citizenship.

Nor is this all. There is in the case of this institution an added reason why high standards should prevail. It stands not only for the intellectual life, for a high idealism. It represents also the ideals of Quakerism. For this reason it has its own peculiar work to do. This is not a limitation. It will preach a love of truth and a fearlessness in the search for truth; it will seek to train men and women to fill with honor the various callings of life; it will take upon itself the duties of the college. But it will, also, teach reverence, sobriety of life, simplicity and sincerity. As a branch of the Christian Church we have for centuries borne our testimony to the enduring value of these things; we have protested in what may well seem, in this day, exaggerated ways against their opposites; and our testimony is now as much called for as it ever was.

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, from New England to California and from Oregon to North Carolina, stretches a chain of educational institutions, founded and maintained by our society, and bearing evidence to its loyal devotion to the cause of learning. My young friends, these institutions have one and all been founded upon the spirit of self-sacrifice. Others have labored, earnestly and prayerfully; you enter into the fruits of their labor. Let this be to you an added incentive to high and unselfish living.

As a Church the Society of Friends has wrought much; as a Church it has still work to do. Let us confidently hope, let us pray, that the highest ideals of Quakerism may ever prevail in this place. And what, my friends, are these? Surely they are ideals of spirituality and simplicity. Rightly understood these are our chiefest characteristics; these are the things whereby our fathers wrought so nobly for God and for humanity. Not by formalism of dress, or conduct, or language, but by spirituality in religion and by simplicity in living. Cherish these things, young men and women; they are our sacred heritage. So will your labors, too, be blest and bear fruit.

The victories of patience are not rewarded with monumental marble nor recorded in the temple of fame. But sweeter and gentler natures are her monoliths. Souls that have been cleansed by the washing of tears, hopes made pure as a dream of God, faith unsullied and a crown that shall never fade, are some of the things that lowly patience builds.—“United Presbyterian.”

A BIT OF HISTORY.

"If thy enemy hunger, feed him."

Stephen and Abigail Hathaway were Friends of good standing who dwelt during the last quarter of the eighteenth century in a comfortable homestead in Southeastern Massachusetts, on the right bank of the Acushnet River, nearly opposite the site whereon, at a later date, the city of New Bedford was builded. Here they lived, loved and labored, and, under the good hand and blessing of the Lord, brought up a family of twelve or thirteen sons and daughters.

In temperament this Friend and his wife were quite dissimilar, the one character the complement of the other. Stephen Hathaway was of a gentle, quiet nature, given to retirement and meditation, often seeking strength and guidance by communion with his Saviour. He was somewhat ascetic in tendency; it was his habit, even during the cold, snowy nights of winter, to walk barefoot around the house-yard before retiring to bed. He conscientiously avoided excess in eating. Withal he was so affectionate and approachable that his children and grandchildren clustered around him, loving him dearly. Friends of that era and region were an austere sect, and of one of Stephen Hathaway's peculiarities they spoke gravely, as if it were counted a vagary pardonable only in one so spiritually-minded; he was given to the singing of hymns! Even at the last, on his deathbed, he asked that one of his granddaughters should sing to him.

Abigail Hathaway, the wife, was a typical New England woman, a true mother in Israel, quick of discernment, prompt in action, managing Church and domestic affairs, we may be sure, with equal energy and discretion. Small leisure found this busy housewife to fondle or pet her children; yet she would cheerfully have laid down her life for them, and by her consistent, Christian walk, and robust, practical piety, she influenced their whole lives for good.

The ties that bind England and America together have become so well knit during the years that have elapsed since the period of which we write, that we can afford to look back with what Secretary Hay terms "the cold and luminous eyes of history," and to recall without embarrassment an incident which occurred during the stormy days of the Revolutionary War, and in which our Friends were directly concerned. One morning, during the prevalence of this conflict, a messenger, breathless with haste, broke in upon the peaceful quiet of the farm house. He reported that a company of the British had landed further down the bay and were coming up the river bank, their trail marked by desolation, as from burning dwelling-houses, barns and haystacks the black smoke ascended.

The spirit of Abigail Hathaway rose equal to the emergency. "Stephen," said she, "do thou take the children and one of the maids, and the chest of silver, and go hide in the woods. I will stay here and meet the soldiers." Stephen, doubtless, may have entered some mild protest against this arrangement, but upon this point family tradition is non-committal. There was short time for parley or discussion. The father, with the little ones, soon departed, wending their way into the seldom-traversed recesses of the wood, leaving the wife free to address herself to the business in hand. Though domestic slavery was at that time dying out among Friends of New England, there was still in every substantial household a retinue of helpers and dependents.

By direction of the mistress, the deep Dutch oven, built out on the side of the house, was speedily heated, and long, well-seasoned logs were rolled into the wide fireplace. Great loaves of wheaten and rye bread were prepared and put in the oven to bake, on the crane hooks over the fire were swung iron pots containing hams, shoulders and pork and beans. A dish of steaming cornmeal mush was stirred up. The contented cackle of the fowls in the yard was changed to cries of dismay as one after another of their number was captured and decapitated; the savory smell of chickens in process of roasting on spits before the fire was soon added to the other appetizing odors. Long tables were spread, butter, milk and cream were brought in from the spring house. The family might have to put up with scant rations for weeks afterwards, but with the preservation of the home itself at stake this was no time for false economy.

These preparations were barely accomplished when up rode the red-coat captain, a little in advance of his company, to make a preliminary inspection before authorizing the usual looting and burning. In the doorway, ready to meet him, stood the dame, in snowy cap and kerchief, stiffly-starched apron and scant russet gown, quite calm and unperturbed. She greeted the British officer courteously, told him that she had been apprised of his coming, and, knowing that both he and his men must be hungry and tired, she had had prepared the best meal that she could on so short a notice. She now invited them in to partake of it, while their jaded horses were being rubbed down and fed in the barn. It is not in the nature of the average Englishman of our own or any past time to resist such an appeal made at once to his heart and to his stomach, nor, after so hospitable a reception, to permit depredations upon the property. The captain, his officers and his men, and his horses ate, drank, and rested, then rode on their way, leaving the homestead unscathed by fire or sword. For many years thereafter "the old Hathaway place on the head of the River Road" stood as a landmark and memorial of the Christian tact and courage with which Abigail Hathaway met and overcame an enemy.

There is a sequel to this story, by which it is pleasantly linked to our own day. Among the younger daughters of the household there was one who bore the name of Alice. There are certain letters still extant, though yellow and fragile with age; through these may be traced the brief life-story of this young girl, though even the missives themselves seem almost to shrink from too inquisitive a scrutiny. She was wooed and won by Asa Russell, an esteemed minister of the Society. He was already a widower, with two or three "little motherless and lonely lambs" to be cared for. Alice Hathaway's wedded life was a brief one; but so dear was she to her husband that even after her death the image of his girl-wife in a dream brought comfort to his sorrowing heart. She left no children of her own, but in the family her memory was cherished, and the name of Alice, handed down from generation to generation, has been borne by some one of the descendants from that day to this.

Here followeth the sequel: On February 25th, 1902, occurred the launching of the German Emperor's yacht, "Meteor," from an American shipyard in New York harbor. At this ceremony, gracefully officiating, stood Alice Lee Roosevelt, daughter of our honored President, Theodore Roosevelt, and, on her mother's side, fifth in lineal descent from the intrepid Quakeress, Abigail Hathaway; beside her stood Heinrich, Prince of Prussia, himself the grandson of Queen Victoria and fourth in direct descent from George III. of England, of the Revolutionary period. Let us hope that the fair Alice of to-day, with the readiness of resource and the courage of her great-grandmother, may also inherit the peace-loving spirit of her Friendly forbears; that she may be of the number "through whose efforts and struggles the world is helped onward, and humanity moves to a higher level and a brighter day."—K., in "The Friend" (London).

OREGON YEARLY MEETING.

Oregon Yearly Meeting convened at Newberg, Seventh month 5th to 10th, inclusive. The first meeting on ministry and oversight was held on the afternoon of the 4th, but the first public session was on the following morning at ten o'clock.

From first to last the meetings seemed under a special overshadowing of the Spirit. Harmony and love prevailed, and from time to time in the various meetings special blessings came to many lives.

We were greatly favored in having with us in the ministry our aged friend, Amos M. Kenworthy, with a minute from San Jose, California; John Frederick Hanson, with a minute from Mt. Vernon, S. D., and Walter Vail, a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. All of these ministers—Amos M. Kenworthy, with his earnestness for rightness with God and righteousness among men; John F. Hanson, with his wide experience and his careful presentation of the subjects of temperance, peace, education, and the fundamental principles of Christianity and doctrines of our Church, and Walter Vail, with his earnest zeal for temperance and peace and Christian living—gave great service in the various meetings of the yearly meeting.

In addition to the ministers already mentioned, and the ministers of the yearly meeting, we were especially favored this year in having with us some ministers who have, during the year, settled in Oregon. These are Elwood Knight, of Rosedale; H. Elmer Pemberton, of Scott's Mills, and Mary Geer, of Marion. Anna Z. Strange, a minister from Boise, who has never before had the privilege of attending the yearly meeting, and Edwin and Myra Smith, who are workers in the Mission at Portland, rendered valuable help in many of the meetings.

There were present, too, for the first time, Levi Lewis and family, and Mylo P. Elliott and family, who have recently settled at Newberg; also John Gilbert and wife and two daughters, from Indiana; Allen J. Pemberton and wife, Albert Mendenhall and wife, Robert VanHorn and wife and Lewis Carpenter, from Iowa. In one of the business sessions the names of the visiting Friends were read and the visitors asked to stand; then the entire meeting rose and sang together, "Blest be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love." The presence and the testimonies of all these Friends gave help and inspiration to the meeting.

All the departments of work seemed to present unusual features of interest this year. The interest in Missions was increased by the presence and interesting talks of Silas R. Moon, who is at the head of the Mission work in Kaak Village, Alaska, and also by the presence and words of Malinda Newby Smith, who spent last year at the Mission. During the missionary session, Anna Belle Gardner, a young lady from Portland Meeting, who has for a number of years been deeply interested in missionary work, came forward and publicly gave herself to the Church and to the Lord for mission work in Alaska. She will go within a few days with Silas Moon, when he returns to that field. The scene of her consecration was most impressive.

The temperance session was very encouraging. The recent victory in Oregon in favor of local and county option gives courage and hope.

At the session considering the subject of peace, John F. Hanson gave a stirring address. The great field open in the Pacific Northwest, and the many calls for help which come, always give spirit to the sessions for Sabbath School, literature and evangelistic work.

Great interest was shown in educational work, and the reports which came in from Pacific College were full of encouragement. The spirit of personal sacrifice and self-denial which has made possible the existence of Pacific College, still continues and gives hope and assurance for the future. Great work has already been accomplished, and great things are yet possible. The spirited report given by Prof. Kelsey, the representative from Pacific College at the Indianapolis Convention, was well received. Walter Miles, a student of the College, after having won the State contest and the contest of the Pacific States, then represented the Pacific States at Indianapolis, where he won first place in what may be rightly said to have been the "greatest oratorical contest of its kind ever held."

Perhaps never in the history of Oregon Yearly Meeting has there been a more hopeful yearly meeting held. The Lord was very near unto His people. The messages which came from various Friends and from the yearly meetings were helpful, and while we feel with others it would be desirable to shorten the epistles, yet Oregon Yearly Meeting is always glad to receive these messages of love and encouragement. The meeting adjourned to meet next year at the same place, Seventh month 11th, 1905.

HENRY EDWIN MCGREW.

Holiness is religious principle put into motion. It is the love of God sent forth into circulation, on the feet, and with the hands of love to men. It is faith gone to work. It is charity coined into actions, and devotion breathing benedictions on human suffering, while it goes up in intercession to the Father of all piety.—F. D. Huntington.

The inquirer after holiness should associate with those whose intelligence will instruct him; whose example will guide him; whose conversation will inspire him; whose cautions will warn him.—J. A. James.

THIRD QUARTER.

LESSON VI.

EIGHTH MONTH 7, 1904.

GOD TAKING CARE OF ELIJAH.

1 Kings 17: 1-16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He careth for you.—1 Pet. 5: 7.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 1.—God taking care of Elijah. 1 Kings 17: 1-7.
Third-day, Eighth mo. 2.—Caring for Elijah. 1 Kings 17: 8-16.
Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 3.—Sorrow and joy. 1 Kings 17: 17-24.
Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 4.—Power of prayer. Jas. 5: 13-20.
Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 5.—Kept by God. Psa. 37: 12-24.
Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 6.—God's care for the faithful. Isa. 33: 13-17.
First-day, Eighth mo. 7.—God's judgments. Amos 4: 6-13.

Time.—Some time during Ahab's reign, 876-853 B.C.

Place.—Samaria, the capital of Israel; the brook Cherith emptying into the Jordan, probably from the east; but it has not been identified; Zarephath, a town between Tyre and Sidon.

Rulers.—Ahab, king of Israel (see last lesson); Asa, king of Judah; Benhadad II., king of Syria; Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon; Mesha, king of Moab.

I. "Elijah, the Tishbite." This is the first mention of him. The Septuagint has it, "of Tishbeh of Gilead," and this seems the most likely. Nothing is known of Tishbeh. His parents, in striking contrast to the usual custom, are not mentioned. Gilead was east of the Jordan; it was a wild country, and its inhabitants were strong, hardy and, perhaps, semi-civilized, similar to the old Scotch Highlanders, as compared with the Lowlanders. "Inhabitants." "Sojourners." Revised Version. It is possible that he had gone to sojourn in Gilead, but the Septuagint Version, as above, is more satisfactory. "Said unto Ahab." It would seem that his appearance was a sudden one. This would be in accordance with the character of the times. "Before whom I stand." Equivalent to "whose servant I am." "But according to my word." "As God shall proclaim through me." "The chief purpose of this prediction of Elijah's is to demonstrate that the God whose servant Elijah is is the sole ruler of nature, against whose will no power in heaven or earth can prevail."

2. "And the word of the Lord came." A special message to Elijah himself. How it came is not related.

3. "Get thee hence." That is, from Samaria, where Ahab was. "Eastward." Toward the Jordan and Gilead. This would be familiar ground to him, and where he could easily conceal himself. "The brook." The course of the stream. This would be dry in summer.

4. "Ravens." As there are no vowels in Hebrew, the consonants might mean Arabs or something else. Thus, in English "nt," by supplying a vowel, could read ant, not, nut, net. There is, however, no need to minimize the miracle. There is no reason why we should not believe that it was the ravens who fed Elijah.

7. "After a while." It is not stated how long, but probably less than a year. Ahab, meanwhile, was searching for him (1 Kings 18: 10).

8. Again there comes a special message.

9. "Zarephath." A city or town about nine miles south of Zidon. This was the Sarepta of the New Testament, where Christ met the Syro-Phenician woman (Luke 4: 26; Matt. 15: 21-28). "Widow woman." An old-fashioned expression. The great enemy of Baal worship would not have been expected to take refuge within the dominions of its great upholder.

10. "Gathering sticks." For her fire. "Water." To give water to a thirsty person is considered in the East a prime duty. Compare John 4: 7.

11. The woman readily starts to comply with the request for water.

12. "As the Lord thy God liveth." This implies that she recognized him as an Israelite. "I have not a cake." This was probably a flat cake of unleavened bread, thin and about ten inches in diameter. "Barrel." In all probability an earthenware jar. "Oil." Olive oil, eaten with bread, as we use butter. "Cruse." A small jar, or bottle, of earthenware also. "Two sticks." Just as we should say "a couple," meaning a very few. "Dress." Make it ready to eat. "Eat it and die." It was the last food they had; she did not see where any more was to come from.

13. "Do as thou hast said." Make the cake, but bring it to me that I may eat it. This was a severe trial of her faith, as there would not be enough for the three.

14. The prophet did not keep her in suspense long. "For thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel." Whether these words confirmed the faith of the heathen woman or not we are not informed; but it is likely that she had faith that the God of the stranger would confirm the stranger's words. "The barrel of meal shall not waste," etc. This was the reward for the ready and complete faith of the woman. Whatever might happen to others, her supply was sure as long as want prevailed in the country.

15. Believing the word of the prophet, she went and carried out his words, though apparently she was giving him the very last of her food. "Many days." Literally, "for some time." The Hebrews used "days" as an indefinite term. "She and he and her house." This implies that Elijah took up his abode with the widow and her son, and this fact is confirmed by the following account (see verse 19).

16. A repetition of the wonderful fact.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Elijah gave prompt obedience to the word of the Lord.
2. Faith is sure to receive its reward.
3. God cares for His children.

A man's country is not a certain area of land—of mountains, rivers and woods—but it is principle; and patriotism is loyalty to that principle.—George William Curtis.

TOPIC FOR EIGHTH MONTH SEVENTH.

GOD'S GUIDING HAND IN OUR LIVES.

1 Chron. 29: 10-12; Luke 12: 1-7.

(Experience Meeting.)

Second-day, Eighth mo. 1.—Jacob's guide. Gen. 28: 10-15.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 2.—Israel's guide. Ex. 13: 17-22.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 3.—Angel guides. Ex. 23: 20-23.

Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 4.—David's guide. Ps. 25: 8-12.

Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 5.—Paul's guide. Rom. 1: 7-13.

Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 6.—Our Guide. John 14: 5, 6.

There is none of us who would deny God's guidance as a matter of promise and of hope; but do we accept or realize the extent of its application in the daily happenings of our lives? When Jesus spoke of the hairs of our heads being numbered, He meant that God really does care, and that He has full knowledge of our needs and our weaknesses, even in the details of life. And He does not take vacations, leaving us at times to shift for ourselves; nor does He wait for the times of stress and emergency when by some striking intervention He may make us know and acknowledge Him as guide.

The voice that says: "This is the way; walk ye in it," may be a very gentle voice; and if we do not heed we will soon fail to hear. The hesitating witness for Christ who wants to be fairly "pushed off the bench" by impulse, needs to learn the gladness of a freely-given offering and the blessedness of a ready acceptance of God-given opportunity.

Though there be as guide the angel that led Israel, or the Lord Himself, who is "with us always," the question is first and last one of our own wills. Paul desired always to do God's will, and therefore he had it as guide continually. We remember his marvelous "leadings," but we have to think but a moment to know how small a part of his life was lived in their actual fulfillment. It was for the most part that every-day purpose of a consecrated mind to do the duty lying nearest.

But geographical nearness was not for Paul, nor is it to be for us, the limits or sole condition of guidance. His knowledge of Macedonia and Rome quickened his love and desire toward them. Peter had no call within himself that sent him down to Cæsarea, but grace had opened his ear to hear the request of the centurion's embassy. It is one of the anomalies of our ideas of guidance that, as Friends, we have attached much importance to the impression of the individual as to service in some locality, while the voluntary, united expression of the thought of those residing there, that such service would be helpful, has been viewed with distrust and even disfavor.

There are many forms of guidance, and the only true honoring of God is to recognize Him in them all, whether the methods seem to us unusual and impressive, or whether we have simply entered the open door of service in obedience to a fixed purpose to serve at all times and in all ways that we may.

MISSION LITERATURE.

The plea of May M. Jones in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of 7th instant for a much larger and better literature in the Spanish language is a most interesting one.

The fact is clearly brought out that there exists in that tongue but a very limited number of books of high character, and that the greater part of them are misleading, dangerous, or frivolous, so that converted people are often led astray by them.

What hope is there that a fitting literature will ever be supplied to them? And is not the situation even worse in this respect in many of the countries in which missions are established? What worthy books or periodicals are there in India, China, Japan, Turkey or Africa, and how many even in Russia, Germany and France which would be wholly acceptable to us?

In order to supply this evident need, what gigantic efforts must be made. Translators of skill and thorough education must cause thousands of authors to speak in other tongues. Money must be poured out like water in the printing and distribution of these works. Private enterprise can hardly be expected to enter a field like this, for the demand must for a long time, if not always, be a limited one, and the purchasers usually possessed of small means.

Besides these there is need of periodicals. Some mission stations issue papers of a most useful character, and which have been of great use in spreading the gospel. But how limited in their size and circulation beside the publications which are all around them, of an opposite class. Truly, it is by divine help only that the convert in such surroundings can hope to retain his faith. Having already so great an advantage, the efforts of evil are multiplied against the believer who is striving to be faithful.

Does not this view of the struggle make it seem a comparatively hopeless one? Is there no better solution of the problem? It is proverbial that when the mountain refused to come to Mahomet, Mahomet went to the mountain.

Is not the only lasting success to be attained by teaching the English language? There is no other to be compared with it in richness of good books and periodicals, and they are constantly pouring from millions of presses in countless profusion. One is bewildered even in attempting to enumerate the classes to which they belong. Translation of any considerable fraction of these is wholly impossible, but all of them are at once available to the child who has learned the language. This is no serious task. The English traveler finds it quite easy to go all over the world with none but his own, and those who talk with and for him are evidently not of the wisest or most studious, always.

We are told there is a very great desire among other nations to learn to speak and understand it. They see many reasons why it will be of value to them, and they come to our missions asking to be taught and willing to pay for the teaching.

By this means it would seem that with the same expense the gospel may be carried to a greater number and more effectively than in any other way and with greater probability of permanent results. Each one of these thus taught will be a center of influence spreading the knowledge of that which has been learned. In this teaching, of course, the lessons will be full of Christianity. The first and principal reading will be the Bible. The exercises will be largely of a similar tendency and the pupil will at length be well equipped and with abundant resources for growth and progress. Some missions are already working in this way. The United States Government by thousands of teachers whom it is sending out to our island possessions is teaching, first of all, the English language in order that we may become a homogeneous and united people. Is not this the most practical method, and if we are to have any permanent success must it not be adopted?

Were we of those who "sit in darkness" what would be our greatest desire? Knowing something of these vast mental treasures would any effort be too great that we might possess the key which would unlock them all for us?

It is true that this means cannot well be used for the instruction and conversion of adults, and that efforts must not be made for them, but even these will often be more effectually reached through their children, who know perfectly their own language, and have also learned the English and the gospel of Christ.

HENRY H. SWIFT.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Sarah P. Morrison is again settled in Richmond, Ind.

Friends of Martha Newby will be pleased to know that her health was so much restored as to enable her to attend practically all the sessions of Oregon Yearly Meeting.

Nine adults and three children were received recently in the meeting at Matamoros, Mex. An equal number of adults and eleven children were received in Victoria.

Lydia Pike and Leona Longstreth left Matamoros for the North immediately after the close of school. Lydia Pike expects to return the 1st of Ninth month.

President Edwin McGrew and his family reached their Oregon home after nearly a year's absence, on the 30th of Sixth month. He was again chosen clerk of Oregon Yearly Meeting.

Jane Blair, an esteemed and valued Friend at Newberg, Ore., was unable to attend the yearly meeting. She is lying critically ill at her home. She was much missed in the meeting, for formerly she was always present and was one of the most competent and devoted members.

Sandwich Quarterly Meeting was held at West Falmouth, Mass., the 14th instant. John M. Watson and Albert Bailey attended, with minutes. Other Friends who are spending the summer in the meeting were very helpful in service and company. John M. Watson will remain for a time in Sandwich.

Through the solicitation of E. Collins, "Pilgrim's Progress" and a number of booklets, printed in Spanish, have been sent by the American Tract Society to May M. Jones, the missionary at Gibara, Cuba, who contributed the article on the need for Spanish Christian literature which appeared in a recent number of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

At Fairmount Monthly Meeting, Indiana, held the 13th instant, Enos Harvey, who has served as pastor in the meeting for eight years, was chosen to continue in that relation for another year from Tenth month 1st, 1904. The meeting is strong and aggressive, and under the guidance and strength of her Lord means to occupy faithfully her field and opportunities for service.

Shawnee Quarterly Meeting, held at Valley Queen, near Tryon, Okla., the 17th to 19th ult., was the largest ever held in that meeting. Some of the members drove fifty miles over very rough roads to attend. J. Edward Hartruck, who is laboring at Tecumseh, was the only visiting Friend. Unity and love were manifested throughout. On Sabbath afternoon G. N. Hartley, who has just returned from Jerusalem, gave a very interesting as well as an instructive account of the trip.

Seth H. Ellis, whose obituary appears in this issue, was master of the State Grange in Ohio for more than twenty years, and for many years he lectured before the Farmers' Institutes in different parts of the State. He had a wide and influential acquaintance with the legislators of the State, which gave him the opportunity to exercise a wise and beneficial force on its legislation. At the time of his death he was a member of the State Board of Agriculture and of the Board of Trustees of the State Experiment Station, and had held a place on the Board of Trustees of the State University. A few months ago, when the centennial of Miami Monthly Meeting was held, he contributed not a little to the success of the occasion, since he was the chairman of the Committee on Program and one of the presiding officers of the public meetings. His funeral was attended by many representative men from various parts of the State.

BORN.

BOWLES.—At Tokio, Japan, Sixth month 25th, 1904, to Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles, a son, Gordon Townsend Bowles.

DIED.

ELLIS.—At his home in Waynesville, O., Sixth month 23d, 1904, Seth H. Ellis, in the 75th year of his age. He was a minister of Miami Monthly Meeting and a member whose words, both in ministry and counsel, were listened to with interest and deference.

JONES.—Suddenly, at South China, Maine, Seventh month 23d, 1904, Edwin Jones, in his 77th year. His constant exhortation for years has been "Press on with joy in this life." He was the youngest brother of Eli Jones and father of Rufus M. Jones.

The "meat strike" seems in a fair way to be settled by arbitration within a few days, but we go to press without a final agreement having been reached.

RACE DONE?

Not a Bit of It.

A man who thought his race was run made a food find that brought him back to perfect health.

"One year ago I was unable to perform any labor. In fact, I was told by my physicians that they could do nothing further for me. I was fast sinking away, for an attack of grip had felt my stomach so weak it could not digest any food sufficient to keep me alive.

"There I was, just wasting away, growing thinner every day and weaker, really being snuffed out simply because I could not get any nourishment from food.

"Then my sister got after me to try Grape-Nuts food, which had done much good for her, and she finally persuaded me, and, although no other food had done me the least bit of good, my stomach handled the Grape-Nuts from the first, and this food supplied the nourishment I had needed. In three months I was so strong I moved from Albany to San Francisco, and, on my three meals of Grape-Nuts and cream every day, I am strong and vigorous and do fifteen hours' work.

"I believe the sickest person in the world could do as I do, eat three meals of nothing but Grape-Nuts and cream and soon be on their feet again in the flush of best health like me.

"Not only am I in perfect physical health again, but my brain is stronger and clearer than it ever was on the old diet. I hope you will write to the names I send you about Grape-Nuts, for I want to see my friends well and strong.

"Just think that a year ago I was dying, but to-day, although I am over 55 years of age, most people take me to be less than 40, and I feel just as young as I look." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

Look for the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in each pkg.

In the House of Commons one day last week Colonial Secretary Lyttelton announced that the government intended next year to give the Transvaal representative institutions by substituting elected for nominated members of the Legislative Council.

Germany is suffering from a drought. All the rivers are unusually low, owing to the light rainfall this summer. The Elbe and the Saale are lowest since 1811. At Hamburg shippers have suspended operations to the upper Elbe, and the movement of freight in the Rhine above Cologne is much impeded. The drouth appears to have reached an acute stage in Silesia, where numerous dye works and factories have closed, owing to lack of water. Almost no rain has fallen for several months. The harvests have been much damaged. An enormous forest fire is raging near Osnabrueck.

Russia's bold acts in sending auxiliary naval vessels through the Dardanelles as merchantmen and then having them stand forth as men-of-war in the Red Sea has been severely denounced by many European papers. The steamship Malacca, an English vessel, was seized and taken to Suda Bay, Island of Crete, where the consuls of Russia and Great Britain jointly inspected the cargo for contraband of war. The Russian officials say that the action will not be repeated, and seem disposed to avoid unpleasant complications if possible. The matters of difference will probably be adjusted without any serious trouble.

"The worst fault of the American colony in Manila," writes William E. Curtis from that town, is "in criticising the government." Yet they come honestly by it. Criticism of the government is an American trait, and even an American institution. Another grave fault of the Americans over there is that they will not go to church. "Clergymen of all denominations, Protestant and Catholic, complain that the American population of Manila do not go to church, and that they neglect other religious duties which they are accustomed to observe at home." "Army officers," the ministers say, "are particularly indifferent, and few of them are ever seen at church, which is in striking contrast with the habits of the British in India, Egypt, Burma, Singapore and every other colony where the established church holds service."

Evidently the electric locomotive is soon to appear on the steam railroad for general use, as well as for hauling trains through tunnels and where smoke and cinders become particularly objectionable. According to a report published in New York last week, the New York Central Company is having several big electric locomotives constructed on plans prepared by a commission of railroad and electrical experts. These machines will weigh nearly 190,000 pounds each, and will possess an indicated horse power of from 2,200 to 2,800, or considerably more than the big steam locomotives, which haul the company's fast express trains. It is understood that while these huge electric motors will be available for any service on any part of the Central's system, they will be used at first on the Hudson River division, and presumably in hauling express trains, for they will have a possible speed of seventy-five miles an hour.

A POSTPONEMENT.

The manufacturing task of printing and binding the forthcoming Exposition number of the "World's Work" has proved to be so much greater than the publishers expected that it has been found necessary to postpone publication to Friday, August 5th, by which time it is expected that all the orders will be completed and the supply exhausted. This number contains considerably over 200 pictures and between 350 and 400 pages. (Doubleday, Page & Co., New York.)

TOLSTOY ON THE WAR.

The leading article in the "Living Age" for July 30th will be "Count Tolstoy on the War." This is the complete text of the ten-column letter in "The London Times," in which Count Tolstoy recently arraigned the Russian Government and the Czar with such vehemence that the Russian Council of State had under serious consideration the punishment of the author for his plain speaking. It is in the Count's most characteristic and scathing style.

PRESENT-DAY ATTITUDE TOWARD RELIGION.

Not a small portion of mankind in Benham accepted their religious doctrine on trust, as they did their drinking water. Either they were too busy to question what seemed authority, or that particular compartment of the brain where absorbing interest in the unseen germinates was empty. Some of the most pious never reasoned, and their docile worship constituted the cement in the walls of dogma. Again, there was a class—a growing class in Benham as elsewhere—composed of well-equipped, active-minded men who were polite to religion if they met her in the street, and would even go to church now and again to oblige a wife or preserve outward appearances, for they were still of the opinion that religion is good for the masses. But in their secret souls what did they believe?

Gordon belonged to still another class. Religious truth had an absorbing interest for him, but what was religious truth? Different sects—and they were manifold in Benham—told him different things, and each sect proclaimed its doctrine insistently as vital, if not to salvation, to the highest spiritual development. Like many a young man before him, he argued that all could not be right, and as a result he presently found himself a member of that secret society of able-bodied, able-minded male citizens—the largest class of all—who reasoned about religious doctrine somewhat in this way: That they were hopefully looking forward to the time when the controversial differences which divided the sects into rival camps should disappear; and that until then they and their successors whose number was sure to be legion would turn deaf ears to the clashing of the divines, and attend church in order to gain strength and inspiration to play their parts well in complex modern human society, ignoring all else but the spirit of Christian love.—From "The Undercurrent," by Robert Grant, in the August "Scribner's" (fiction number).

CHARLES WAGNER TO VISIT AMERICA.

The interesting announcement is made in "McClure's" for August that Charles Wagner, the author of "The Simple Life," is to visit this country in the fall, as follows:

"The thousands of Americans who have been reading 'The Simple Life' and 'By the Fireside' will be interested in the announcement that Charles Wagner is to make his first visit to the United States this autumn. He comes to see the people who have grasped so eagerly his doctrine of 'The Simple Life.' Of his reception he is assured in advance. He wants to see the President who wrote, 'I preach your gospel to my countrymen'; and he wants to study the life of these 'countrymen.'

"Among the interesting results of Mr. Wagner's trip will be the record of his impressions of America, which will appear in part in 'McClure's Magazine.' What the man who wrote and believes in 'The Simple Life' will think of our complex and strenuous existence cannot but interest us all."

A LEAVE-TAKING.

Forgive me, but I cannot rest;
My feet grow eager for the street;
The God of roads and stars knew best,
And wanted we should meet:—

But not to tarry, else why made.
Good friend, the endless road is fair;
Chequered his days with light and shade,
And cast them everywhere?

Why on each other's faces pore,
And die but midway of our kind;
While yet so much lies spread before,
So little, friend, behind?

Farewell! One pleasant halt it o'er;
One spell more hast thou on me cast;
I must go knock at every door
To find mine own at last.
—Christian Gauss, in August "Century."

The prophecy made by the ingenious novelist, H. G. Wells, of a great development of rapid transit by automobile over special highways prepared for high speed may in some degree be verified, if the plans recently broached for an "auto road" between New York and Chicago are put into effect. The proposed line would run through Binghamton, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo and South Bend, thus closely following the route of the Lake Shore Railway, though care would be taken to tap new territory. Merchants in the cities along the line are said to take an interest in the project.

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

CARE FOR THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

There is no narrowing so deadly as the narrowing of man's horizon of spiritual things. No worse evil could befall him in his course on earth than to lose sight of Heaven. And it is not civilization that can prevent this; it is not civilization that can compensate for it. No widening of science, no possession of abstract truth, can indemnify for an enfeebled hold on the highest and central truths of humanity. "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

A HOUSE, BUT NOT A HOME.

[These beautiful lines were found among the papers of Lydia C. Cadbury, who deceased Seventh month 15th, 1904. The author is not known.—Ed.]

"Tell thou to my friends, when weeping,
They my words descry,
Here you find my body sleeping,
But it is not I!
Now in life immortal hovering,
Far away I roam,
This was but my house, my cov'ring,
'Tis no more my home.

"This was as the cage that bound me;
I the bird, have flown;
This was but the shell around me;
I the pearl, am gone!
Over me as o'er a treasure,
Had a spell been cast,
God has spoken at his pleasure,
I am free at last!

"Thanks and praise to Him be given
Who hath set me free,
Now forevermore in heaven
Shall my dwelling be,
There I stand his face beholding,
With the saints in light,
Present, future, past unfolding
In this mirror bright.

"Toiling through the plain I leave you,
I have journeyed on,
From your tents why should it grieve you,
Friends, to find me gone?
Let the house forsaken perish!
Let the shell decay!
Break the cage, destroy the garment,
I am far away!

"Call not this my death, I pray you, •
'Tis my life of life!
Goal of all my weary longings,
End of all my strife.
Think of God with love forever;
Know his name is love!
Come to Him, distrust Him never;
He rewards above.

"I behold each dauntless spirit,
All your ways I view;
Lo, the portion I inherit
Is reserved for you."

LEARNING TO LIVE IN A NEW WORLD.

OFTEN we sit and wonder, after a dear one has left us through the gate of death, how it would seem to go through and wake up on the other side! It is hard to imagine the life and scenery in a world entirely new. We always catch ourselves carrying our old experiences into everything which we try to picture. Before we visit a new place we vaguely construct an image of it in the mind, built out of descriptions which we have heard, and filled in with our own memories of similar places. But when we actually arrive, we are apt to say, "This is entirely different from anything I imagined." If that is the case with earthly scenes, how certainly must it be so with that country from which no traveler has returned with reports, and of which "no sociable angel has breathed an early syllable."

What are the experiences of the newly-parted soul? Is it true, as a great poet sings, that the soul, once through the "blessed gate," sees

"In a fountain fresh,
All knowledge that the sons of flesh
Shall gather in the cycled times."

Does that vast world of the spirit, with its heights and depths, its lengths and its breadths, break upon the newcomer, from the land of rocks and hills and trees, all at once? Does he feel at home, and join immediately in the activities of the long-accustomed citizens of that city? Or does he, rather, slowly learn the riches of the new realm, and the manners of its inhabitants? Who can give the answer? No one feels himself a bold expert in this field. But is not there something to be learned from the newly-arrived in this world?

The room into which the baby is born is crammed with love. The hearts of father and mother are swelling with emotion. Love is there before he arrives; affection is ripe before he appears. He comes to an intimate circle all waiting for him, and his first cry stirs one of the deepest joys which this earth of ours ever gives a mortal to feel. He has indeed come to his own. Does the little new-born appreciate it all and tell how glad he is to be on these shores among such kindly people, and amid such happy scenes? Not at all. Love is something new and strange. He had not learned it in the other world where he was. It takes some time to discover how wonderful it is and to be able to contribute his part of love to the happy circle around him. He learns it because it is the very atmosphere into which he has come. Those who were there ahead of him teach it to him as fast as he is able to learn, until, like his own small circle, he, too, is ripe in love.

Think, too, how little the newcomer knows of the size of the world he has come into. His tiny body has formed itself in most narrow and contracted quarters. There was not a bit of wasted space. He has come from a world meant only for one, and he touched all the sides of his nutshell of a realm. Here he is now in a universe which has no limits. The room seems at first a whole world. But it is not. It is only one room in a larger house, and the house is only one house in a larger city, and the city is in a State, and the State is in a nation, and the nation is in a continent, and the continent is in a world, and the world is in a solar system, and the solar system is in an immeasurably spacious universe.

How impossible for those little blinking eyes, too weak for one glance at the sun, to take in all this. He must slowly spell out the wonders of his new home. Those who have learned ahead of him will teach him as fast as the mind can comprehend. There is no contrast greater than that between the first home of the unborn and the second home into which birth brings the minute life. But does any one suppose that the soul, freed from the limits and constraints of body altogether, will have less sweeping changes of life and scenery? Contrasts increase as we mount. The higher the life the higher correspondingly is the environment of it. Here we have infinities of space, there we shall find new kinds of infinity, now unimaginable. Here we learn the meaning of the "group-love" into which we are born, there we shall learn the inconceivably higher spiritual qualities of the realm, so near yet so unknown. One thing is sure, where much has to be guessed, when we wake there, and learn what we have come to, we shall be satisfied!

"STATE OF SOCIETY."

This is an interesting ancient Quaker phrase, which means, when translated into modern language, the moral and spiritual condition of the membership composing a monthly or quarterly or yearly meeting. In former times the "state of society" was supposed to be presented by the answers to the queries and in the communications which these answers called forth. The time devoted to the queries was known as a "consideration of the state of society." It was one of the most solemn parts of a business meeting, and always occupied the central place in the exercises of the yearly meeting. It is not our purpose now to discuss the question, whether this old-time "consideration of the state of society" really brought to light the actual moral and spiritual condition of the meeting or not. Many have thought that it did not, and that the main value of the exercise was to be found in the solemn manner of the "consideration" and in the exhortations to which the occasions gave rise. Others would take a very different view; still others do not know enough about the ancient practice to have an opinion at all.

At any rate, in most of our yearly meetings the queries no longer receive formal, definite answers, and another method has been adopted to find out the moral and spiritual condition of the Church. Each monthly meeting reports once in the year to its quarterly meeting "on the spiritual condition of the membership, of the attendance upon public worship, of family devotions, of the conduct of the members to one another, and to the world, of Christian work in which the members are engaged, and of such other matters as may pertain to the affairs of the congregation." (Uniform Discipline, Part II., Chap. XII., Sec. 1, par. 8.) The quarterly meetings are to make a comprehensive summary of this information, which in turn is sent up to the yearly meeting. It is expected that these reports will be read, and that the members may see the state of the Church spread out in some detail. Then from these reports a summary will be made up to print in the minutes and preserve for future reference. This plan ought to give a clear and full account of the state and activities of the yearly meeting. Does it succeed in doing it? So far, it has not been a very great success, because it has not been treated as a matter of sufficient importance, and too little interest has been taken in it. It is a matter of vital importance and ought to be a central exercise of the yearly meeting, not an unimportant side issue, to be pushed off into a corner.

The value of this new method depends largely on the way in which the subordinate meetings make their reports. The trouble with the old answers to the queries was that they were too formal, cut and dried. They gave a very slight amount of actual information. They did not cover a very wide range of activities. They were uninteresting except to the expert in phraseology. These new reports are to touch all that concerns the life of the Church, they are to draw upon everything which is of interest to the membership. They are to contain concrete information, as that "a Bible School is being held in five school houses, and an evening meeting in three, in our monthly meeting," or "we are visiting all the homes in the limits of this meeting," or "we have made a special effort this year to reach all the young people in the neighborhood, with the result that fifteen have been added to our meeting," and more of a similar sort. The remarks and addresses which are made during the consideration of the state of the Church ought, again, to be practical and vital. They ought to deal with live issues, and throw light on the work of the Church and its attitude. It should at least concern a yearly meeting as much to know its own condition and its own spiritual energy as it does to know about the working of its mission station in some foreign land, or the state of its educational institutions at which a few of its members are being educated. This subject needs much more attention than it now receives.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE TRAGEDY OF JUDAS.

BY CHARLES M. WOODMAN.

"Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" Luke 22: 48.

This question introduces us to the last scene but one in a series of pictures that may be called the Tragedy of Judas. No character in history has been assigned a lower place in the scale of humanity than this single man, Judas. Upon him has been heaped all the ignominy of the ages, and he has stood through the years of the Christian era as the very embodiment of that most awful sin, treachery. The traitor is the one whom common law gives over to the gallows, patriotism shoots in cold blood, and public opinion assigns to the lowest pit of hell. We can let the man alone who differs with us, we can honor the man who opposes us, but the man who is with us to our face, and against us when our back is turned, is the one above all others whom we loathe, whose very presence is an offense to an honest man. Brutus, who stoops to kiss the hand of Cæsar, and then stabs him in the back; Benedict Arnold, who assumes responsible positions in the salvation of his country, and then uses those places to give his country to the enemy, and Judas, who planted upon the face of his Master the kiss of friendship, and by that very act pointed Him out to His enemies, these men we think of as worthless wretches, whom by sufferance only we admit are members of the human family. By sufferance only? Ah, no! for have you not seen in your own life the very marks of the deceit that led these men to the culminating act which has disgraced them before the world for all time. The deception, the lie, the hypocrisy, the appearing to be or to do the thing that we are in reality not, or are not doing, is the hideous, heinous sin which we see in its full bloom in the lives of these men—Brutus, Arnold and Judas.

The Tragedy of Judas—Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? These words reveal to us two things: first, Judas, his act and his heart, and, second, Christ and His heart. They speak to us of Judas' relation to Jesus, and of Jesus' relation to Judas. They are the culmination of certain feelings, traits of character, that for months now have been developing in the hearts of these two men. To state it baldly at the very start, they reveal the slipping, slipping down of the character of Judas, and the supreme effort of the Christ as He reaches down to raise him up. Let us look at it, first from the standpoint of Judas, and then from the standpoint of Christ.

"Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" A supreme act of treachery is the verdict that we pass upon this deed. It is the use of an act of friendship to ruin a life. But had it no antecedents? Was there nothing back in the life of Judas that led him step by step to this the culminating act of the traitor? Was there ever a time in his relation to Jesus when he deserved the name of disciple? Was there ever a time when he was not the traitor that we see him to be in this act? Ah, yes, once he was true, once he was honest, once he was sincere. No great act of sin, though it seems to burst out like the eruption of a volcano, ever reveals itself without due warning. It seems sudden to the casual observer, but to him who knows the life of the individual the forces that are at work within can be plainly seen. The great tree in the forest under the blast of the wind falls with a crash to the ground, and we wonder how the wind could accomplish so mighty a feat. It seems strange to us, but to him who knows that in that tree the worms have been at work for years, until they have eaten out its very heart; to him who understands that the vitality of the tree has been sapped away little by little, the sudden fall is but the culmination of a process that has been going on it may be for years.

And so it was with Judas. His fall was like the mighty crash of a wooded giant that comes falling down suddenly in the midst of the forest, and all the ground around is shaken. This disciple, this apostle, who was so close to the very Christ Himself falls, even to the extent of betraying his Lord. How it must have shocked that little group of men who had mingled with him for so long! How it must have shocked the followers of Christ to see one from the inner circle thus prove false, and how even the enemies of the Christ were surprised to find one from the very midst of the disciples turn his back upon his Lord! But it did not shock Christ. He had seen the evil working in this man's nature, He had seen the character of this one being eaten into little by little, until He realized that the time would come when it would all culminate in the traitor's kiss.

Look at his history. The first act of this tragedy of Judas reveals his identity with the other disciples of the Christ. His identity with them in fellowship, in work, in power. Christ called him as He called the others, He sent him out to preach as He sent out the others. He gave to him the power over disease as He gave it to the other disciples.

As we pass from this to the second act of the tragedy, we note a change. Judas followed Christ as many if not all of the disciples at first followed Him, because he thought that Christ was the Messiah who was to set up an earthly kingdom. As his disciple he believed, of course, that when the kingdom was established he with others would be given places of prominence. To rule, to have authority, was the ambition of his life, and he followed Christ for what he could get out of it.

In this he, like many others in that time, and in this time as well, was disappointed. He expected Christ would in due time assert His claims to the earthly kingdom. As long as the multitudes thronged Him Judas was all right; and we can imagine with what impatience he looked for the time when the Master would declare Himself, call to His standard all true patriots and cast the Romans out. But he didn't see it, it didn't come to pass, and little by little he saw that the people who had thronged Him were leaving. Was this one who promised to be the Messiah not going to set up the kingdom that Israel had looked for so long? It seemed that way, and Judas, who had come among this group of men in order that he might be one of the rulers in that kingdom that was going to be set up found that he had been disappointed, and as he put it to his own conscience, and really made himself believe it, "I have been deceived in following this man." Do you not see how the selfishness of his life, becoming disappointed, turned his professed love for Christ little by little to dislike, and so on to hate?

He had come to Christ for the chance to rule, for position, for wealth, for renown, and he had found it not. So now he makes the inward resolve which was the foreshadowing of that awful act, the kiss of betrayal. "I will remain among these men, I will still follow Him, but as He has trusted to me the care of the finances of this little group I will take every opportunity to lay my hands upon whatever I can."

See the character of the man revealed on that day that a feast was given to the Master. His feeling toward Him has so intensified itself now that he cannot bear to have any one show to him their true love, or give to Him the offering of an unselfish heart.

It is that scene in Bethany—Mary, out of a full heart of sympathy and love, breaks upon His feet the pound of precious ointment, and wipes His feet with the hair of her head. Judas stands there with a scowl upon his brow while she performs that act of love. He endures it as long as he can, and then with a snarl, in an undertone, he says, "Why was not that sold for money and the proceeds given to the poor? Why didn't the Master tell her to sell the ointment and give the money to those who needed it?" Then there came the after thought, which remained unexpressed: "Then the Master would have given me the money to distribute, and I would have put it in my own pocket. I will get out of Him all that I can now that He has disappointed me." Note with what rapidity that feeling which began simply as selfishness passed from a professed love to hate, and then to covetousness and theft. See how it culminates now in the act for which the name of Judas has become a by-word and a hissing. The very next day this feeling that he had in his heart, this feeling of opposition to the Master, drives him into the city, and with that burning desire for money still uppermost in his thoughts he goes to the rulers and says, "How much will you give me if I will in some convenient time give Him over to your hands?" The bargain is made for thirty pieces of silver, and now he is ever on the watch for his opportunity. Into the upper room he goes with the other disciples to eat the feast, still posing as the follower of the Christ. But with what unerring aim the Master points out to him his guilt, and tells him to do quickly the thing that he has in hand. He leaves the room, out into the darkness he goes, he finds the rulers, asks for a band of soldiers, and goes out in the hunt for the man whom he professed to love. And whither? Into that place that was so well known to him as the Master's place of prayer, into that sacred place where the Master was wont to meet His Father in heaven, and pour out to Him the needs of His life, where He was wont to pour out His prayers for His disciples, His prayer for Judas. Here he leads that mob, and here, as he expected, he finds the man. Stepping up to Him in the darkness—the light could never bear a scene like that—he gives to Him the sign of a friendship's greeting and places upon His cheek the kiss of a traitor. Oh, Judas! with all the selfishness of your nature disappointed, with all its covetousness and theft, with all its deception, how could you ever come to the place where, under the guise of a friend, you could prove yourself the traitor? How could he do it? Could he answer you to-day, I seem to hear his words that fall upon us with a fearful warning. "This came not in a moment, it was the result of months of brooding. In my younger days I was selfish, I practised deceit, and though my fall seemed to come like a lightning flash it is in reality but the flowering of the plant that I allowed to take root in my life in the early days when I had every chance to make the most of myself. The kiss of the traitor is but the blossom of deceit and lying."

But do you think that Judas was thus left all alone to slip down the mountain side of character to the very lowest depths of humanity, to the very brink of hell? Very far from it. You may despise him for his deed as well you may. You may call him a coward, a traitor, and pour upon his head all the epithets of ignominy that you can think of, but you must not forget that that man had a soul, and you can never cease to marvel at the wonderful love of the very man whom he betrayed, a love that reached itself down to the very brink of hell itself, and sought to bring even this man up to the light. Watch the Christ as with consummate skill He seeks to touch the conscience of this disciple who has drifted so far away. He does not take him, as it were, by main force and drag him from his sin. God never treats us that way. We would leave our sin perhaps if He did, but we would love it still, and return to it as soon as we had the opportunity. He does not do this, for this would not save the man; but He attempts, with the skill of an artist, to touch the conscience of Judas, hoping that by the awakening of that within him which was rapidly becoming seared over with the intense passion of his sin He could thus save his soul. How did He do it? In the first place, He allowed Judas to remain as a member of that inner circle of His followers in the hope that the power of His personality would in time crowd down the evil in the heart of Judas, that the good which was there might triumph. The other disciples who had this same love for temporal power in the first place, were won over to the Christ's way of looking at things by the power of that wonderful personality.

Would it not have the same effect upon Judas? Many people wonder how Christ could allow a man to remain in His company who was so wicked. It is not strange when you understand the heart of Christ, and realize that it is His wish to save even the vilest of men. It is not strange when you stop to think that Christ saved men then as He saves men now, not by laying down a set of rules, but by bringing the man into touch with the power of His Person. This is why He kept Judas in the apostolic company, because He wanted to save him.

But now as He sees that the power of His personality fails to keep the man from sinking lower and lower in the scale of character, and as He sees that the evil in his heart is taking positive form in an attempt to take His life, He takes one more step; He doesn't thrust him out as you and I would, but He brings him closer to Him. In that upper room, as they were gathering around the table to eat the pass-over supper, let us remember that the place to the left of the host was the position of honor. Christ was the host that night, and we have good reason to believe that in the place to his left there sat, not John, not Peter, not James, or Andrew, but none other than Judas himself. And why was he there in that place of highest honor? Was he not given that place that Christ might show to him by this act which would speak louder than words that there was a place for him still in the heart of the Master if he would but take it? Thus Christ tried to win him.

But again not only did Christ try to win him in this last hour by this act of signal honor, but by giving him an opportunity to turn from his sin he showed the longing of the Christ heart to save. In the midst of the feast, as a profound hush fell over that little group, and these solemn words fell from the Master's lips, "One of you shall betray Me," what a look of consternation comes over the faces of that company of men as they look into each other's startled faces, and say, with an agony of soul, "Is it I?" Why did He say that? To lay bare to the heart of Judas the awfulness of his sin in the midst of surroundings so sacred that their very presence would perhaps lead him to say, "O Lord, I had it in my heart to betray Thee, but I crave Thy forgiveness." That was the opportunity Christ gave him, but it produced no effect; it did not awaken his conscience.

And now comes the final effort of the Christ as He longs to reach the soul of this wayward disciple, who seems to be slipping from his grasp. He takes the op—that is, the bitter herbs—and a portion of the paschal lamb, and as a supreme act of hospitality hands it to Judas as the guest of honor. Will it reach his heart? It ought, but to all intents and purposes it failed. The soul of Judas is wrapped in a cloud of hate. Then the Master, in the expression of a desire to be alone with those who are true to Him, after He has tried every means in his power to save this man, turns to him, and says, "That thou doest, do quickly," and Judas, rising from the table, goes out into the night, and his soul goes out into the night that is darker than the darkest midnight.

As we meditate upon these scenes in the upper room, we say that surely the Christ has done all that men or angels or God Himself could do to win and save this man. So we think, but not so the Christ, for even now He will not let this man go until his conscience is touched. Pass with me to that final meeting between Judas and Christ in the garden, that final scene that was enacted in the presence of the frightened disciples, and the howling mob at Judas' heels. Under the cover of night, and in the darkness of his soul into which no ray of light has yet flashed, this cowardly, deceitful disciple, by an act which speaks always of the deepest friendship, planted upon the cheek of Christ that traitorous kiss. What would you and I have done had we been in Christ's place? Would our heart have gone out after the heart of the man that had thus betrayed us? That is what Christ's heart did, and He made the final effort to reach the conscience of this man. There falls from His lips those words that, like an arrow swift and penetrating, breaks through the crust of his nature, and strikes the still living spark of conscience that smoulders in his bosom. Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? Then that conscience bursts into flame, a flame that burns and burns and burns unceasingly.

Judas now slips into the background; the rulers want no more of him. He drops out of sight to watch the progress of events, and to hear the ring of that call of conscience that grows louder and louder as the minutes and the hours go by. There flashes into his mind now all the words and the deeds of Christ which were poured out upon him that he might turn from his sin. He sees the meaning of them all now that it is too late, and he realizes that even to the last the Jesus whom he so wickedly betrayed was striving to save him from the sin. Then there springs up in his soul the reality of the deed that he has committed. "I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood." "I have sinned, I have sinned, I have betrayed innocent blood." He turns to the leaders to try to get help to remedy the wrong, but their sneering answer only deepens the intensity of the thrust of conscience. "What is that to us? See thou to that." "I have sinned, I have sinned," he cries, and taking the thirty pieces of silver that have burned in his hands like the sting of serpents he dashes them upon the temple floor and rushes out into the night. Out into the night with that cry still ringing in his ears, out into the night, in the still hush that comes before the dawn, we might have seen him as he wanders off alone seeking to get away from that awful sound that rings louder and ever louder in his soul. He finds no relief, and then this cowardly life ends itself in that act of supreme cowardice—suicide. Judas hangs himself, with that call of conscience still ringing in his soul. He hangs himself at the dawn of the day, but his soul comes not to the light that is waiting still to receive it. We say he received the due reward of his deed, but here is the wonder that passes even our comprehension. That light that was breaking over the city should have spoken to him of the light that was still burning in the heart of the Christ for him. That light of love which Judas realized now had burned so brightly for him in those last hours in the upper room, that light of love that had made such a struggle to save him as he stood upon the very brink of hell. Oh, why did he not realize that that light was burning even now, that its flame was even intensified as the Christ approached the cross? The light of love that burned so radiantly in the upper room, and again in a very lightning flash in the midst of the darkness of the garden, in that question, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" that love burned for Judas in an ever-increasing power until it flashed out in glory upon the cross of Calvary. Would that Judas had turned his eyes to see it! Would that he had turned to embrace it in contrition and forgiveness! Then would his end have been, not that of a coward, but he would have found peace at the feet of his true Lord and Christ.

As we stand before this awful tragedy of Judas, and note the steps by which he passed down and down and down and out into the darkness, there is but one thing to say: The traitor's kiss is simply the flowering of the plant of a deceptive life. We loathe the traitor's kiss, but how prone we are to love the lie and foster in our hearts the practice of deceit. We loathe the cowardice of Judas, but how many of us have not dodged behind the convenient lie and the deception to hide our wrong deed!

As we stand before this tragedy of Judas, and see how the hand of the Christ reached out and down and down to the very lowest depths to save this man, there breaks upon our vision the reality of one great truth. Each time I sin, each time I practice the deception or the lie, the hand of the Christ reaches out to me in just as real a sense as it reached out to save Judas. I may not see it. Judas didn't until the very last. But I may ever know that the light of love is always burning in the heart of Christ, and waiting, waiting for me to turn from a life of deceit and lying and hypocrisy to the life that is true, noble, honest and sincere.

THIS ONE THING.

BY J. R. MILLER.

There is a great deal of waste in all lines of living, because men scatter their energies over too wide a field. Instead of doing one thing well, they do a dozen things poorly.

"One thing I do," said St. Paul. There is incalculable power in such concentration. No man is great enough to do everything. "To each one his work" is the divine law. There is some one thing which each one can do better than anything else, and that is God's plan for that man's life. The reason many men fail in life is because they go from calling to calling, not staying at anything long enough to master it. The secret of success, on the other hand, is in choosing one's calling wisely and then giving one's whole energy to it, persistently, unweariedly. He who does this may fail again and again, but he is never discouraged and at last succeeds.

"Blest is the man of high ideals,
Who fails to-day, to-morrow, and for days to come,
But never lowers his standards, nor surrenders to defeat,
Till hand and foot, till eye and ear,
Till vocal chord and tongue,
Till mind and heart are disciplined,
And all abilities of body and of soul
Are marshalled by the will
And move onward to the drumbeat of perfection."

Our Lord's own life is the best illustration we can find of this concentration of all the energies in one purpose. Christ came to do the Father's will. "I do always those things that please Him," was His life motto. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me and to finish His work." He knew what that must mean to Him. The shadow of the cross fell athwart His path in the quietest days. He knew where the path was leading. But He never once turned aside. His purpose never weakened.

The "one thing" of every Christian life should be Christ's "one thing"—the will of God. This makes living very simple. We will have no question ever as to what we ought to do—it will all be plain for us—what God wills. This will cover not only the spiritual part of our life, but also what we call the secular part. Paul was running his race just as truly and as earnestly when he was making tents as when he was preaching. Jesus spent many years in the carpenter's shop, but He was doing His Father's will then as earnestly and as beautifully as when He was leaving the paschal Supper for the Mount of Olives with a hymn of praise on His lips.

This motto would lead us to put all our skill and strength into everything we do. If you send only a line to your friend, make that line sublime. Gather all the forces of your heart into every kindness you show. Do nothing negligently. An old painter of Sienna, after standing a long time in silent meditation before his canvas, with hands crossed meekly on his breast, and head bent reverently, turned away and said, "May God forgive me that I did not do it better." Some of us will stand one day before our finished life work and say with painful regret and bitter sorrow, "May God forgive me that I did not do it better."

Such an absorbing passion for Christ will bring all our life into full harmony with Christ. When we can truly say, "One thing I do," love for Christ filling our heart, all our life will soon be Christ's. A writer tells this story of a college student. A friend gave him a pure, inspiring, refining picture, and asked him to hang it up in his room and keep it there for a year. The young man cared more for worldly things for a good time, than for his studies. He was not as careful as he should have been about the kind of pleasure he sought. One day his friend called on him and saw the picture on the wall, but all about it a strange group of low sporting and other questionable prints. The pure, holy picture seemed strangely out of place in such unhallowed company. Yet the young man himself did not appear to be conscious of anything unfitting in the surroundings.

Six months later, however, the friend was in the student's room again. There was the picture in its place on the wall, but all the sporting, gay and questionable prints were gone, and in their place hung other pictures—pure, refining and beautiful—all of them in harmony with the central picture. The visitor showed surprise and pleasure as he looked about the room and saw the change. "You see, I couldn't leave them up with that," the young man said. "The contrast was too dreadful. I didn't see it at first, but looking at your picture opened my eyes to their unfitness and I took them all down and burned them. Then I bought other pictures to put in their place, but they all had to be in harmony with the one in the center." So it is always when Christ is taken into the life and becomes the inspiration of all the springs of the life. Everything that is not in harmony with Christ must come down.

The final fruit of such a controlling purpose in the heart is a life full of holy, consecrated service. It was so in St. Paul's case. More and more as self died and Christ lived in him did love grow. Some men as they get more religious, become less beautiful in their spirit, less gentle, less kindly, less patient and charitable, less helpful. They seem to grow away from people as they try to live nearer to God. But it is not true religion, not the religion of Christ, that affects men in this way. Never did any other man get so near to people as Christ did. He lived among them, they trusted Him, they told Him everything, they were not afraid of Him. Whenever Christ enters a man truly and takes possession of him, one of the unmistakable marks of His being in the man is the new love that begins to appear in the man's life. The end of such a life is the losing of self in a life of untiring service of others.

ELEANOR HENLEY.

It is but fitting that a brief account of the beautiful life of Eleanor Lassiter Henley be given for the benefit of the many who have known and loved her. Her long, active life, so full of blessing to others, came to a close the 13th of Tenth month, 1903, after a brief illness, caused by paralysis. She had passed her 79th year, and had survived her husband, David V. Henley, almost ten years, he having passed away Eleventh month 1st, 1893. They were united in marriage in 1844. He was a birthright Friend, but she was reared by most worthy Methodist parents, and it was some years after her marriage before she became a "convinced Friend," she and her children uniting with Friends in 1862. They were then members of Back Creek Monthly Meeting, in Randolph County, N. C. In the spring of 1865 they removed to Guilford County, and attached themselves to Deep River Monthly Meeting. The 16th of Fourth month, 1876, Eleanor was appointed to the station of elder, which place she filled acceptably until Fourth month, 1890, when she was recorded a minister. She spent much time and traveled many miles, visiting meetings, families, jails, almshouses and doing whatever the Lord directed.

Her life was largely spent in loving ministrations to others—at the bedside of the sick and suffering, comforting the dying and those in distress. Truly can it be said of her, as she "went about doing good," "she stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy." She sought in every way possible to relieve the wants and needs of those less fortunate than herself. Proverbs 31: 10-31 is but a description of her life throughout.

She was strong in principle, pure and upright in her character, loving, kind and patient in disposition, industrious in habit, and ever true to her convictions of right. A loving and devoted wife, a loving, faithful and exemplary mother; teaching ever by precept and example what was pure and elevating to her children, who "arise up and call her blessed."

Her home was the home of all God's messengers who came that way, and many indeed who read this sketch, will remember her kind hospitality to them, her hands ministering kindly to their temporal needs while she sought to encourage them in their work for the Master.

Rearing a large family of children (thirteen, all of whom survive her), her life was naturally a very busy one, especially in the "earlier days," when all the family garments were manufactured by her own hands from the raw material, and there were few labor-saving conveniences available. Yet she found time to do good to others.

Her later years were less filled with care, and the last few years she could but yield to the loving ministration of her children.

With Paul she could say, "I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

In the presence of several of her children, watching by her bedside, she passed to the rest prepared for "those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Man was meant to be an oak, not an acorn, but many are content to remain the mere embryos of unexpanded power. The difference between the acorn and the oak is growth. Vigor and fiber and sinewy usefulness come by growth. But if man is content to remain as God created him, then all maturity of power is impossible. God says to the seed, grow; to the intellect, grow; to the immortal soul, grow. Rise out of thy acorn life until under thy shadow the magna charta of empires may be traced, angels may meet with thee and thy leaves be for the healing of the nations.—"The United Presbyterian."

LESSON VII.

EIGHTH MONTH 14, 1904.

OBADIAH AND ELIJAH.

1 Kings 18: 1-16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth. 1 Kings 18: 12.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 8.—Obadiah and Elijah. 1 Kings 18: 1-6.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 9.—Obadiah and Elijah. 1 Kings 18: 7-19.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 10.—A grievous famine. Jer. 14: 1-9.

Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 11.—God's judgments. Joel 1: 1-20.

Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 12.—Famine of God's word. Amos 8: 11-14.

Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 13.—Sin causes calamities. Isa. 59: 1-15.

First-day, Eighth mo. 14.—Boldness against sin. Ezek. 3: 4-9.

Time.—Rather more than three years after Elijah's first appearance before Ahab; about 870 B.C.

Place.—Northwest from Jezreel, the city in the plain of Jezreel, and possibly on the slope of Mount Carmel.

Rulers.—Ahab, king of Israel, in the twelfth year of his reign; Jehosaphat, king of Israel, in the eighth year of his reign.

There is no parallel in Chronicles.

1. "In the third year." This shows that Elijah remained in the house of the widow at Zarephath something over two years. "Go shew thyself to Ahab." As the announcement of the drought had been made to Ahab (1 Kings 17: 1), it was fitting that the coming of rain should be told to Ahab also.

2. "Elijah went to shew himself unto Ahab." This was a great test of Elijah's faith, for Elijah knew perfectly well the character of Ahab and his queen, Jezebel. "And the famine was sore in Samaria." R. V. The country surrounding the capital city. It is not needful to suppose that the famine was a very extensive one; owing to the slender means of communication, a circumscribed famine might exist. This was no uncommon occurrence in India, but now, owing to the railroads, relief is easily and quickly brought from other districts.

3. "Obadiah." The name signifies the "servant of Jehovah." "Which was over the household." R. V. That is, he was the chamberlain, or major-domo. Ahab knew he was one whom he could trust, possibly because he knew he was a faithful servant of Jehovah. "Feared the Lord greatly." Reverenced the Lord.

4. "When Jezebel cut off the prophets of the Lord." The history of this effort to suppress the religion of Jehovah is not given, though it is alluded to in 1 Kings 19: 10, 14. Probably most of those who were slain were the "sons of the prophets," who attended the schools of the prophets. See 2 Kings 2: 3, 5, 7, which implies that the number was large. It was also probably a hundred of these whom Obadiah hid. "By fifty." This number would be more easily concealed than a hundred. The country is a limestone one, and caves are abundant in the hills. Witness the history of David.

5. "Fountains." Springs, or perennial streams. "Brooks." The streams which might or do dry up in summer, but in which there might be a little moisture, where there might be grass for the animals.

6. "Divided the land." Each agreed to take certain districts so the search might be more thorough and quicker. From the fact that Obadiah met Elijah, who was in the north, it would seem that Ahab took the southern part and Obadiah the northern.

7. "Is it thou, my lord Elijah?" Obadiah recognized him and accorded him at once the position of superiority by word and action. He would probably have known him from his dress (2 Kings 1: 7, 8).

8. "And he answered, it is I." R. V. Elijah wastes no words.

9. "Wherein have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab to slay me?" R. V. This fear is natural. He was to tell the king that Elijah, whom the king had diligently sought, had been found, and yet he could not but fear that Elijah would disappear as mysteriously as he had done before. In such a case Obadiah's life would be worth little.

10. "No nation, or kingdom." Of course he means no nation or kingdom within reach. The Orientals are still given to hyperbole and extravagant statements in order to be emphatic. Compare Gen. 7: 19; Deut. 2: 25. "He took an oath." The search had been a very thorough one, and, after it was fruitless, a formal attestation of the fact was made.

11. "Now thou sayest." Can I trust to finding thee after what has happened?

12. "The spirit of the Lord shall carry thee." In some supernatural manner. Compare Acts 8: 39; 2 Kings 2: 16; Matt. 4: 1. "He shall slay me." This was no idle fear; Ahab would have slain without hesitation if it pleased him so to do. "I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth." This shows that the worship of Jehovah had not died out in Israel. How fully Obadiah served the Lord is not told, whether his worship was whole-hearted may be doubted, but it is hard to judge fairly of those who are in circumstances widely different from our own, and whose opportunities for knowledge have been limited.

13. Obadiah relates an incident, already referred to, to prove his devotion to Jehovah. He seems to think that Elijah would believe nothing but evil of any member of Ahab's household.

15. "And Elijah said." He was ready to confirm with an oath what he said. "As the Lord of Hosts liveth." This was a peculiarly solemn title, and carried certainty with it. It probably means the "Lord of the universe." Compare 1 Kings 17: 1.

16. "So Obadiah went to meet Ahab." He had no doubt now that Elijah would come to meet Ahab.

Every man is lord of that which he leads; he is monarch of that which he masters, be it only an axe, a plane, or a plow. Better wield a hammer and do it well, than an empire and do it ill. The hand that is cunning is the hand that rules the world. Every man is a king over the kingdom he has conquered. Over no other dominion is he fitted to reign.—"The United Presbyterian."

TOPIC FOR EIGHTH MONTH FOURTEENTH.

OBEYING WHEN OBEDIENCE IS HARD.

Gen. 22: 1-8.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 8.—The first duty. Deut. 4: 1, 2, 6.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 9.—Our whole duty. Eccl. 12: 11-14.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 10.—It takes courage. Josh. 23: 1-8.

Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 11.—Is blessed. Ps. 106: 1-3.

Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 12.—Shows good sense. Ps. 111: 1-10.

Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 13.—Christ's obedience. Phil. 2: 1-8.

An obedience that takes note of hard and easy is in o far imperfect. Obedience is doing the truth as best we know it, and to stop to measure the quality is n some degree to consider whether or not we shall obey. When we begin to pity ourselves for the hardships of obedience, we are getting ready to shirk those hardships and are moving toward disobedience.

We know what a spoiled child is. He has had an easy life; nothing hard has been required of him, and nothing worthy has been developed within. Disappointments and difficulties overwhelm at their first hadowy approach, and the unlaunched bark goes to decay on the sands of the shore to which fear binds
it. It is such failure that is real hardship.

The boldest journey ever made was that into the shadows of Gethsemane and the gloom of Calvary, and it was crowned with a glory that marks it out as the pre-eminent achievement of all time. But it never could have been accomplished—the way through the tomb to the brightness beyond would never have been known to us, if there had not been One who had "learned obedience by the things which He suffered," and hence could say, "Not my will but thine." That was a hard obedience, but it was not with Jesus a question of what was hard or easy, but of the will of the Father. When that was known there was but the one pathway to walk in, for with Him to know was to do.

The pursuit of knowledge is fascinating, and the world joins readily in it. Science, with its exactness of definition and conclusion, claims to bring to men to-day an understanding of the universe and its laws such as has never been before. But exacting as is science in these regards, it is lax in the requirement of performance. "There is a learning which exhilarates and pleases, but makes no appeal to the will;
there is a disposition to be interested in Truth as an abstraction unrelated to the concrete duties of life."

Yet no one can know the heights and depths who will not obey to the very letter the teachings that are already known. He that willeth to do shall know, and it is to them that obey—and to none besides—that Christ has become the author of salvation.

Did any man at his death ever regret his conflicts with himself, his victories over appetite, his scorn of impure pleasure, or his sufferings for righteousness' sake?—Channing.

Educational.

PENN COLLEGE—THE BIBLICAL DEPART- MENT.

BY DR. WILLIAM L. PEARSON.

It should be more generally known than it is, that Penn College has, within a few years, developed its Biblical instruction and Christian education to quite an advanced degree.

First of all, the college curriculum contains, as a basis of all its work, four well-constructed, comprehensive courses of study. In this it has long adhered to the golden mean between the old curriculum of two courses and the present custom of a number of groups. Iowa colleges generally regard what is known as the group system as lowering and narrowing the standard of college education, which should be liberal in quantity and quality. Among Western colleges Penn has an enviable name "for honest, thorough work, and for the character of its catalogue statements, as well as for a clear comprehension of the mission of a college."

As a second fundamental element for a Christian college the English Bible is given a distinct place.
At Penn every student, except the Seniors, who take Ethics and Theism, must take a regular course once a week in the Scriptures. In addition to this there are usually from nine to twelve voluntary Bible classes and two mission study classes, with an unusual amount of Christian work done by students in the college and outside. Thus it is seen that Penn's intellectual standard and Christian character are of high order. These are both essential elements in the fitness of an institution to teach morals, religion and theology.

On such a basis the Biblical Department of Penn College is established with three courses of study.
The Classical-Biblical is one of the four regular courses in the college curriculum. Leading universities regard it as a liberal classical course, well defined and complete. It has a liberal amount of mathematics and more language, history and philosophy than undergraduate classical courses usually have.
It contains, also, a year and two-thirds of regular Biblical and theological instruction. One would hardly find its equal as offering a liberal classical and Christian education, whether one feels called to the ministry or not. Those completing it receive the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

The Graduate Course enables those who have completed the Classical-Biblical Course to extend the work to almost three years in a Friends' college, including all the most important branches of the ordinary theological course. No Friend need go beyond the Society to pursue his work in these lines, unless he have some specialty in view. On completion of the Graduate Course of one year the student is admitted to the degree of Master of Arts.

The English-Biblical Course of two years is offered to those who cannot complete a full college course.
It includes such parts of the Classical-Biblical Course as may be taken by English students, with the privilege of special courses in the English Bible. As in the other courses of this department, thoroughness and breadth are sought. Besides the Biblical work liberal instruction is given in Literature, History, Psychology and Ethics, and students are encouraged to elect two years of Greek, with special attention given to New Testament Greek, and one year of Biology or Chemistry. •

These points in the instruction at Penn may be mentioned:

1. That the purpose of Biblical Department is to meet the demand now more felt in all the churches than ever before, particularly in the Society of Friends, for well-informed and spiritually-minded ministers, missionaries, Biblical school teachers and Christian workers. 2. The importance of thorough and advanced Biblical scholarship is emphasized as an essential part of Christian education. 3. Biblical scholarship must be accompanied by a liberal education unless the Christian teacher, who must speak with authority, is to be narrow, superficial and dogmatic about non-essentials. Among other things the New Testament teacher will, if possible, acquaint himself with his Greek Testament, and undergo rigid exegetical discipline. The Old Testament teacher should have a like training in the Hebrew Scriptures. One cannot fairly interpret the thought and history of any great people without the literary flavor to be obtained only through the medium of their original language. 4. Purely critical questions should occupy a small proportion of time towards the end of the course, that the student may come to understand the literary problems past and present. This should be with an open mind, free from the bias of both the old and the new tradition, that he may have a fair knowledge of the origin and value of the Holy Scriptures, and confidence in their credibility and divine authority. Throughout these courses the doctrines of the Society of Friends are seen to accord with Biblical and Christian truth. But special lessons from Robert Barclay and other Friendly authorities on the Source of Divine Truth, the Scriptures, the Guidance and Teaching of Holy Spirit, Worship, the Christian Ministry, also, well illustrate the vital character and catholic spirit of genuine Christianity.

It will have been seen that all the instruction in the Biblical Department is closely related to that of the whole curriculum and partly dependent upon it. Every professor of the college contributes very materially to this work. In particular Biblical students are encouraged to elect a year of Science—either Biology, Chemistry, Economics and Sociology, or Geology and Astronomy, and they are required to take Psychology, Ethics, the History of Philosophy and Theism.

The principal of the department gives courses in Biblical, Apostolic and Church History, the Life of Christ, Comparative Religion, Old Testament Literature, Old Testament Exegesis, New Testament Literature, New Testament Exegesis and Biblical Theology. Professor William Eugene Berry has recently been elected and will teach the classes in Hebrew and class in New Testament Greek. He is a graduate of Penn College, having taken most of the Biblical Course, and has been a Semitic student of high standing at Harvard the past two years, being last year secretary of the Harvard Semitic Conference. He has been admitted to the degree of Master of Arts by both Penn College and Harvard University. He has given much attention to Semitic languages and history, to Greek and to Comparative Religion.

AN OPEN LETTER.

DEAR FRIEND: Shouldst thou know of any one affiliated with or interested in "The Society of Friends" intending to sojourn in Philadelphia the coming winter for educational or other purposes, if thou wilt kindly inform the committee of "The Monthly Meeting of Friends for the Western District" (known as Twelfth Street Friends) on attention to member and attenders they will esteem it a favor, and be glad to extend proper courtesies to them, to which end full information is desirable.

In behalf of the Committee on Schools and Colleges,

WILLIAM E. TATUM.

842 N. Forty-first St., Philadelphia.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Curtis Aye, of Cayuga, Ind., will serve as pastor in the meeting at Watseka, Ill., the coming year.

Do any of our readers know where we can find a copy of "Ritualism Dethroned," by William B. Orvis?

Oscar Moon, pastor in the meeting, Knightstown, Ind., and Joseph O. Binford, attended the Bible Institute at Earlham College.

Luke Woodard and wife, Fountain City, visited relatives and attended meeting at Knightstown the 31st ult. His services were very acceptable.

Willis Bond, of Watseka, Ill., has accepted a call to Moorsville, Ind., to serve as pastor the coming year. He will begin the work about the first of Ninth month.

Lewis E. Stout, pastor in the meeting, Plainfield, Ind., stopped at Knightstown to visit relatives on his way to Richmond to attend the Biblical Institute at Earlham College.

Daisy Barr, who has served in the meeting at Greenfield Ind., for two and a half years, has declined to serve the meeting the coming year. She may engage in pastoral work elsewhere, but more probably will do evangelistic work.

Sandwich Quarterly Meeting, Mass., and New Bedford Monthly Meeting, in particular, have sustained a great loss in the removal, by death, of two well-known Friends, who occupied the position of elders in that meeting—Joshua L. Macomber, of Mattapoisett, and John B. Baylies, of New Bedford. Obituary notices appear in this issue.

Nerius M. Hodgins, pastor at Monrovia, Ind., preached at Bridgeport Meeting the 17th ult. He was former pastor in the meeting for three years. Herbert W. Reynolds, the present pastor, preached a temperance sermon the 24th, and a number of talks were made on the same subject in the evening. The meeting manifests a general interest in this subject. Bridgeport, Ind., Christian Endeavor Society held a successful social at the home of the president, Earnest Hawkins, the evening of the 19th ult.

John H. Dillingham was one of the speakers at the Union meeting held at West Falmouth, Mass., during "Old Home Week."

The monthly meeting, Knightstown, Ind., was held the 24th ult. F. W. Thomas preached a very acceptable sermon. Oliver Beeson was granted a minute for service in Michigan for two months. Francis Trueblood, of Bradon, Fla., who came as a delegate to the Prohibition Convention at Indianapolis, was also present. He attended the tent meeting at Spiceland, Ind., the evening of the 24th, also the 25th.

Melville D. Hawkins attended the recent State Christian Endeavor Convention at Fort Wayne, Ind., as the delegate from the Christian Endeavor Society at Bridgeport, Ind., and on the evening of the 3d ult. gave a full report of the convention, occupying the hour following the regular Endeavor meeting. His report was inspiring and well received. He is a graduate of Central Academy, Plainfield, Ind.

The Friends' Christian Endeavor Society of Millbrook, N. Y., invited the Methodist and Reformed churches to meet with them in a union Peace meeting the evening of the 17th ult. A large audience gathered, filling the house. The ministers of all the churches spoke strongly for Peace. The subject taken by the Methodist Episcopal pastor was "The Prince of Peace," while the Reformed pastor dwelt upon the negative side of "In Time of Peace Prepare for War." One of the Friends' ministers engaged in prayer. Another spoke of Christ's example and precepts for Peace, and a third was leader of the meeting, and spoke of the progress of the cause of Peace in recent years. He also presented the petition proposed by the United Society Christian Endeavor to be sent to Congress, looking to the establishment of a congress of nations for the consideration of international questions.

An interesting situation is revealed by the following letter: Iowa Monthly Meeting, Oklahoma, was held at the Iowa Indian Mission, near Perkins Post Office, the 2d instant. The statistics for the past year showed a gain of fifty members, with twenty-three received that day. This is a very small part of what might be. We have a great field before us. It is impossible to comprehend what might be accomplished for Christ and the Friends. There are several calls now for series of meetings, which is very uncommon for this country. If Friends care to become established, if they care to extend their borders, they must be alive to these openings. There is not a better chance for our denomination than here in Oklahoma; not a place where there are better results for the labor put forth and capital expended. Laborers are feeling a concern about this field, and are offering to come, but we are not financially able to say to them, Come. We are impressed with the belief that God has the means somewhere in His treasury to assist in this work. We have earnestly prayed that the needed amount may be found." Albert Benson, superintendent of E. and P. Work, Agra, Okla.

The 249 students who have taken more or less work, some as much as one and a half to two full years, in the Biblical Department in Penn College, represent seventeen Christian denominations. About one-fourth of them are ministers of the Gospel, and one-third of these are non-Friends. Many are teachers, a number are pastors, and others are home and foreign missionaries, not only preaching the Gospel, but establishing the schools, benevolent institutions and useful industries so essential to Christian civilization, making known to the infidel, suffering pagans the most effective and helpful agencies of Christianity. Noteworthy are a number of recent graduates, and a few others, of high educational standing, of whom several have been appointed to important missionary posts in Jamaica, Mexico and Japan. One is at the head of the Friends' Tokyo mission, and three are fortifying a stronghold at Gibara, Cuba, and will occupy a field for Friends, including several towns and cities. One is a missionary in Alaska, and one in Argentine Republic. Six others have gone to foreign fields, while others are preparing to respond to the call to India, Africa and other fields. One is a college president, and another is a college president and a minister highly esteemed East and West; one is a valued minister and professor of history in another college; two are professors of literature in other colleges; one is professor of Latin in another college; one is professor of biology in a college. In all, sixteen have been or are professors, and three others instructors, in colleges. One was two years a valued secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association, and two young women are secretaries in large cities. Several have been successful secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations; one is evangelistic superintendent of a yearly meeting; one is evangelistic superintendent of a large quarterly meeting; one is a social secretary for some 2,000 girls in a large English manufacturing establishment; one is traveling secretary for the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, organizing the work among colleges and universities East and West; one is general missionary of the American Sunday School Union; two are superintendents of schools in cities; several have been holders of scholarships in Eastern colleges and universities; one is a superior student in Semitic languages at Harvard University, and secretary of the Harvard Semitic Club. A large number are teachers. Nearly all have been graduated within a few years. And the Biblical Department will, next year, have promising classes of students. Among them are young ministers and workers, devoted and successful in the Master's service, and others are coming forward for the home and foreign fields. The excellent courses of study in the Biblical Department have been much improved, offering unusual opportunity for biblical and theological instruction.

She gave twenty-nine years to public school teaching in Kansas and Colorado, being president of the Denver Teachers' Association at the time of her death. She was through all her adult life engaged earnestly in Bible School work either as teacher or superintendent. She had in large measure the gift of comradeship with her pupils and with all young people with whom she came in contact, and many a youth has turned to a nobler life by reason of her kindly appreciation of his possibilities. She was throughout her life a Friend. She was ever a joyful and busy Christian and fell asleep in the triumph of her faith.

WELL SPOKEN.

A Chat About Food.

"Speaking of food," says a Chicago woman, "I am 61 years of age and was an invalid more than fourteen years.

"Was five years in the Presbyterian Hospital on diet most of the time. Had an operation for a dilated stomach, a very serious operation performed by a famous physician.

"After the operation, of course, the doctors ordered Grape-Nuts as the most nourishing food, and easiest of digestion. That's how I know the stomach will digest Grape-Nuts when it will absolutely refuse all other kinds of food. It has also done wonders for me to brighten up and strengthen my nerves, and made me feel a desire to live, for I can enjoy life. What seems so strange to me is that I have never tired of this food since, but like it better all the time. I find it especially good in any kind of soup or broth.

"I have a sister who is an invalid from indigestion, and she has been greatly benefited by Grape-Nuts which she eats three times a day, and a bowl of milk and Grape-Nuts just before going to bed; in fact, she lives on this food, and I also have two nieces who used to be troubled with indigestion, but used Grape-Nuts with grand results, and so I could go on and name many others who have been helped in the same way." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Grape-Nuts food is used by hospitals and physicians very largely, for no food known is so easy and perfect for complete digestion, while at the same time it is a concentrated form of nourishment of the highest grade and the stomach will handle it when everything else is refused.

"There's a reason."

A report from Nagartse, Tibet, dated Seventh month 20th, says the Tibetan peace delegates met the British mission and professed a willingness to arrange peace if the commission would return to Gyantse. Colonel Younghusband replied that he could only make peace at Lassa, but that he was willing to discuss terms while proceeding there.

The "meat strike" has grown in complications during the past week, and some rioting has been reported. All hopes of an immediate settlement have been abandoned. The teamsters refused to join the strikers, however, and enough outside help has been secured to keep the packing houses running. Thus it looks as if a meat famine would be averted.

The massacre of two Roman Catholic missionaries at Ichang, in the Chinese province of Hupee, is an incident of much greater importance than it may seem at first sight, inasmuch as it happens at a moment when the relations between France and the Holy See are unusually strained, and thus makes a weighty factor in the situation, for France exercises a protectorate over all Catholic missions in the Far East, and it is her privilege to demand satisfaction for the murders just committed. Should the concordat be denounced, France would lose this protectorate, which is of great importance to her prestige and commerce in the East, and it would probably go to Germany, who is known to covet it.

The line of construction of the Panama Railroad, when it was built, about half a century ago, was one long graveyard. The workmen of the De Lesseps Company found the Panama climate scarcely less deadly. The Americans about to enter upon the construction of the ship canal have to reckon with the same climate. They have found, however, a way to render that climate, if not healthful, at least comparatively harmless, and that is by establishing and maintaining a policy of non-intercourse with the Panama mosquito. Governor-General Davis, of Panama, advises the Panama Canal Commission to purchase 100,000 yards of wire gauze for the houses and hospital along the canal zone. It is estimated that 10,000 lives can be saved by a judicious use of this material.

One of the most striking things seen by visitors to the Electrical Building at the Chicago Exposition in 1893 was a new process for welding steel by electricity. To see a steel rail turn white hot when it was dipped in a tub of water was certainly most spectacular. The new processes have been greatly developed since then, and Consul-General Mason of Berlin now sends an account of a new and cheaper method, which makes the welding of rails entirely practicable. The base of the new process is "thermite," made of pulverized aluminum and oxide of chromium, the chemical reaction of which furnishes the necessary heat at slight cost. There are now thirty miles of welded track in Berlin, and within the past few months the system has been introduced into about forty European cities. The advantage is that the jolting over joints, which is such a drawback to the pleasure of trolley riding, is quite eliminated, and with it much of the noise of the trolley cars. It is only a question of time when the practice will become general in this country.

The most interesting development connection with the war in the Far East during the past week was the sinking of the Knight Commander, a British steamer, carrying an American cargo from New York to Yokohama. This was accomplished by the Vladivostok fleet near the coast of Japan. Much of the cargo was materials which Russia defines as contraband of war, but the circumstance brings up a number of questions which are not yet settled. The British Government lost no time in forwarding to St. Petersburg an emphatic protest, with a demand for apology and reparation, for the sinking of the steamer. No government could have done less, and, unless it can be supposed that Russia is seeking a general war, may be expected that the demand will be complied with. The St. Petersburg Government will, doubtless, wish to receive an official report of the occurrence before making a final reply; but the protest is against any right of a belligerent to destroy neutral vessels at sea without adjudication, and in this all maritime nations will be united.

"My being a good musician saved my life the last time the levee gave way," said Mrs. Mississippi. "Why, how was that?" said Mrs. Boston. "Well, you see, my husband floated down the river on the stove"—"Well?" "I accompanied him on the piano."

MISUNDERSTOOD IRONY.

Stories are told of criminals that become persuaded of their own innocence by the eloquence of their lawyers, but it is not often that a jury is so persuaded without any such intention on the speaker's part. But a burglar was on trial in a country town, and the witty judge tried to relieve the dullness of the court by summing up after this fashion:

"I think it is only due to the prisoner to point out that in proceeding about his enterprise he at all events displayed remarkable consideration for the inmates of the house. For instance, rather than disturb the owner, an invalid lady, as you will have remarked, with commendable solicitude, he removed his boots and went about in his stockings, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. Further,

BUNCH TOGETHER.

Coffee has a Curious way of Finally Attacking Some Organ.

Ails that come from coffee are cumulative; that is, unless the coffee is taken away new troubles are continually appearing and the old ones get worse.

"To begin with," says a Kansan, "I was a slave to coffee just as thousands of others to-day; thought I could not live without drinking strong coffee every morning for breakfast, and I had sick headaches that kept me in bed several days every month. Could hardly keep my food on my stomach, but would vomit as long as I could throw anything up, and when I could get hot coffee to stay on my stomach I thought I was better.

"Well, two years ago this spring I was that sick with rheumatism I could not use my right arm to do anything, had heart trouble, was nervous. My nerves were all unstrung and my finger nails and tips were blue as if I had a chill all the time, and my face and hands yellow as a pumpkin. My doctor said it was heart disease and rheumatism, and my neighbors said I had Bright's Disease and was going to die.

"Well, I did not know what on earth was the matter, and every morning would drag myself out of bed and go to breakfast, not to eat anything, but to force down some more coffee. Then in a little while I would be so nervous, my heart would beat like everything.

"Finally one morning I told my husband I believed coffee was the cause of this trouble, and that I thought I would try Postum which I had seen advertised. He said, 'All right,' so we got Postum and although I did not like it at first I got right down to business, and made it according to directions; then it was fine, and the whole family got to using it, and I tell you it has worked wonders for me. Thanks to Postum in place of the poison, coffee, I now enjoy good health, have not been in bed with sick headache for two years, although I had it for 30 years before I began Postum and my nerves are now strong, and I have no trouble from my heart or from the rheumatism.

"I consider Postum a necessary article of food on my table. My friends who come here and taste my Postum say it is delicious." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

instead of rushing with heedless rapacity into the pantry, he carefully removed the coal-scuttle and any other obstacles which, had he thoughtlessly collided with them, would have created a noise that must have aroused the jaded servants from their well-earned repose."

After proceeding in this strain for some little time, he dismissed the jury to consider their verdict, and was horror-struck when on their return into court they pronounced the acquittal of the prisoner!—Ex.

The first time, when at night I went about

Locking the doors and windows everywhere,

After she died, I seemed to lock her out
In the starred silence and the homeless air,

And leave her waiting in her gentle way
All through the night, till the disconsolate day,

Upon the threshold, while we slept, awake;

Such things the heart can bear and yet not break.

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

A report from Chicago says that the Pullman shops, where 1,200 workmen have already been laid off, will soon be shut down and 6,000 men thrown out of employment indefinitely. The vice-president of the company, T. W. Wickes, says the step is forced upon the company. "The business of car building has been remarkably dull for many months. The railroad companies have been placing few orders for coaches with our company, or any other."

"I liked my coffee strong and I drank it strong," says a Pennsylvania woman, telling a good story, "and although I had headaches nearly every day I just wouldn't believe there was any connection between the two. I had weak and heavy spells and palpitation of the heart, too, and although husband told me he thought it was coffee that made me so poorly, and did not drink it himself, for he said it did not agree with him, yet I loved my coffee and thought I just couldn't do without it."

"One day a friend called at my home—that was a year ago. I spoke about how well she was looking and she said:

"Yes, and I feel well, too. It's because I am drinking Postum in place of ordinary coffee."

"I said, what is Postum?"

"Then she told me how it was a food-drink and how much better she felt since using it in place of coffee or tea, so I sent to the store and bought a package, and when it was made according to directions it was so good I have never bought a pound of coffee since. I began to improve immediately."

"I cannot begin to tell you how much better I feel since using Postum and leaving coffee alone. My health is better than it has been for years, and I cannot say enough in praise of this delicious food drink." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

HE STAYED TO DINNER.

My little cousin James has always liked to be at our house very much, and ever since he was a tiny lad has used reasoning powers and invented ways and means to "get over to Aunt Susan's" which would do credit to a veteran. He has a fondness for staying to dinner.

When James was about five years old, one day he appeared at about dinner-time, accidentally, of course. We knew what they were to have for dinner at his home, so thought we would catch him in a trap out of which he could not squirm this time.

I said, "Why, James! It is almost dinner-time, and you'd better hurry home."

"Oh," said he, "I ain't very hungry." I remarked, "You are going to have fresh pork for dinner."

"I don't like fresh pork a bit," said James hopefully.

"But we are going to have fresh pork, too," I rejoined.

He paused a second in the act of removing his coat, and rolled his big eyes up at me, saying very solemnly and wishfully, "I like fresh pork over here."

That ended it. The day was carried, and, needless to say, he stayed to dinner. —C. E. World.

THE SINS OF SAINTS.

WHAT a nuisance a single mosquito sometimes is! You have put screens on your windows. You think you have done everything to make your sleeping peaceful, and you lie down expecting an undisturbed rest. Just as you are sinking off into forgetfulness, there comes an ominous sound—not loud, to be sure, but full of disaster for sleep. In vain the sleeper strikes at his darting foe. Off he goes to a far corner of the room and waits so long that you decide that you must have succeeded in your aim. Alas, no. Once more the dismal sound arises close to your head, and once more the useless stroke is made. This visitor is equal to an all-night contest, and in the morning he will be sitting full of your blood in a quiet corner of the ceiling.

How did he get in? Where did he come from? He probably hatched out in your own cellar. It is worth knowing that these little beasts winter in almost everybody's cellar, and as each one is capable of producing about three hundred offspring the chances for summer annoyance are great. It is all right to have screens, but it is also a good thing to watch for hatchlings from the inside! Now all this is a parable with an application.

Many of us are pretty well screened against spiritual foes from without. Temptations which once assailed us no longer get in. We feel sure of ourselves in reference to the great catalogue of ordinary sins. Our life is well shut in away from the dangers which wrought havoc with us once.

The main danger now, however, is from the petty little things which have their birth within ourselves—little, persistent, inward faults which spoil our peace almost as much as outbreking, willful sins. One person would be a saint if it were not for his "moods" which make him disagreeable to his friends and a disturbing element wherever he appears, when the "mood" is on. He is "above" conscious sin, but he has these annoying hatchlings in his own cellar which mar his saintliness and lessen the value of his attainments. Another person just misses saintliness by being jealous of other "saints." This petty little beast comes out of his cellar and spoils his inward calm and affects all he does. He cannot bear to see others more holy than himself, and he suffers when others are more appreciated than he is himself. No screens help him here. He must make the house absolutely clean within. Jealousy will tend to spoil any "saint," for it keeps hatching out more offspring.

Judging and misjudging are frequent sins of "saints." They hatch so easily! Before one knows it he has said or thought some harsh, unfair thing, until the spirit of judging grows upon him and keeps him from possessing that love without which no true saint can be. What a host of things can come up out of one's inward basement! The devil is said to go about like "a roaring lion." That makes it easy to hear him and be on the guard. These inward hatchlings are so noiseless and sly that they often rise up through our entire self before we are aware that they exist.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE want to call the attention of our readers to the opportunities which are open for American Friends at Woodbrooke, as announced in another column. Some American Friends have already enjoyed short courses in this delightful spot. The intermingling of English and American Friends in such ways is very desirable and will undoubtedly help the cause in both countries.

THE religious public is a good deal disturbed over the action of Bishop Potter, of New York, in "dedicating" the "Subway Tavern," which is a modified saloon, furnishing proper entertainment, wholesome foods and soft drinks in the front room, and intoxicants in the back room. It is a well-intentioned scheme to find a "substitute" for the saloon proper, but it has seemed to many, and it seems to us, a questionable substitute. There is no doubt at all that saloons will never be abolished until some substitute is found for them. They are at present the poor man's and the working man's club, and here the tired toiler finds the companionship which, alas, he fails to find at "home." There must be places provided where he will feel at home and where he can relax in a healthy way. But to set up a bar supplied with all the intoxicants makes the "substitute" too much like the original thing, and then to sanction it in the name of the church comes dangerously near telling men that liquor drinking is to be recognized as a normal part of Christian life.

THE London meeting for sufferings took action against a firm of beer bottlers to restrain said firm from using the term "Quaker Beer" as a trademark. The meeting for sufferings has been defeated. The judge rules that there is no substantial grievance. He holds that Quakers are so well known and respected, that it is absurd to suppose that this trademark will cast any reflection upon them. Many Friends have expressed disappointment at the decision. There is no occasion for disappointment. Such things do not hurt us. In this country we have "Quaker Oats" and "Friends' Oats"; the "George Fox Cigar"; "Quaker Salve," and a periodical of fiction called "The Quaker." These things are annoying to us, of course, and we dislike to see these brands and trademarks, but in a way it is a public testimony of appreciation. The name is chosen because it is believed to stand for purity and honesty. It signifies to the public good quality. Now the only real harm or injury which can come to us would be to lose the reality for which this name stands. So long as we preserve the substance and maintain the quality which have made the genuine Quaker known we can endure the dislike of seeing the name used for advertising schemes. The real trouble would be to arrive at a condition when the name had no such significance!

PREACHING OUTSIDE OF THE PULPIT.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

I became a preacher in order to bring God's message to my fellow-men, to awaken those who are careless, instruct those who are ignorant, comfort those who are in trouble, help those who are weak, and lead immortal souls to Jesus Christ; in short, my aim is to make bad people good, and good people better. To attract people to the house of God is of far less importance than to attract them to Christ; the making a good sermon is mainly of value that it makes a good man. A wise minister will not belittle his pulpit by neglecting to make full preparation for it, but at the same time he will recognize that he can spend only about three or four hours in that pulpit on only one day of the seven; and whether in the pulpit or out of it, he is everywhere Christ's ambassador.

The Bible is the best theological seminary, and in that he learns that his Divine Master delivered two popular discourses which the Holy Spirit has preserved for us; one of them was delivered on a mountain, and the other by the seaside. The great body of our Lord's instructions were in the form of personal conversations with individuals or with his little band of disciples. That quiet evening talk with Nicodemus has shaped all Christian theology and moulded myriads of human characters, and will continue to until the end of time. The apostles pursued the same methods with their Master; and the book of the Acts is largely the record of personal labors for the conversion or the spiritual benefit of individuals. Paul preached public discourses when he had the opportunity; but I question whether his sublime discourse on Mars' Hill has ever brought as many souls to the Saviour as his brief talk with one poor awakening sinner in the person of Philippi. The danger with us ministers is that we look at our flock too much as a totality; the word "masses" is a misleading word. We preach on Sabbath to a congregation; but God's eye sees only individuals. Guilt is a thing appertaining to an individual conscience; and conversion is the turning of a single soul to Jesus. If we preach to a congregation for an hour or two on the Sabbath, it is a joyful thought to an earnest soul-winner that he can preach outside of his pulpit for more than a hundred hours during the week.

One of the unanswerable arguments for thorough pastoral visitation is that it brings a minister within arm's length of his parishioners. He needs this personal contact for his own benefit. A good library is a good thing; but there is a great difference between a lifeless book on your shelf and the vitalizing and fertilizing study of a book in boots; for every life is a biography. You and I, my dear brother, are helping to make these biographies. Our sermons are addressed to everybody; a conversation is addressed to a single soul. "Thou art the man" is the meaning of every loving appeal, every kind rebuke, and every personal invitation. A man may dodge a sermon; he cannot dodge a personal conversation conducted in a right spirit. A faithful sermon ought to set your people to thinking. In one mind it may suggest difficulties, and when that person meets you he may wish to have the difficulty explained; the door is thus opened for you to remove an obstacle, or to press home a needed truth. In another mind your sermon may have awakened a conviction of sin. The impression may fade away, or it may be deepened if it is followed up by a personal interview. Much of many a pastor's best work has been done in an "inquiry meeting"; but even when no method is used, there will be opportunities for every wide-awake pastor to find out who in his parish is an "anxious inquirer." You ought to have a fixed time in every week when persons can call on you; and if any one breaks into your study during your morning hours for spiritual direction, you ought to rejoice to throw aside books or sermon notes and give him the right of way. The man that wants you is the man that you want. It is an excellent method also to request your congregation to send a request to you if they desire an interview in their own homes. Remember how cordially the Master met every one who came to Him for light or for healing, and what a long journey he took in order to bring relief to one poor woman in the coasts of Canaan. In dealing with awakened souls nothing can take the place of personal contact. To reach all such from the pulpit only is almost as absurd as it would be for a physician to write his prescriptions from a desk in a hospital instead of going from one bed to another to feel each pulse, and to examine each fever-coated tongue.

No pastor worthy of the name will need to be reminded how strong are the claims on him of the Lord's "shut-ins" whose faces are not seen in the sanctuary. Whosoever you neglect, never neglect the sick—especially those who are in the by-lanes of poverty. There is no more Christlike work than that, and none that will grip your people to you more strongly. The hours you spend in the ministrations of comfort to the sick and the sorrowing will often subject your nerves and your sympathetic sensibilities to a severe strain. The most-celebrated pulpit orator in America once said to me: "It consumes more of my nerve force to spend an hour with people who are in trouble than to prepare two sermons." That may be so; but is there any more Christly office in this old sobbing and suffering world than to "bind up the broken-hearted"? What your people want is the ministry of sympathy; and the rich often need it as truly as the wretched poor.

I have indicated some of the ways in which a faithful minister may preach outside of his Sabbath pulpit. There is one style of preaching that is vastly more effective than any other, and that is the irresistible eloquence of a poor, manly, noble and unselfish life. "My pastor's discourses are not very brilliant," said an intelligent lady, "but his daily life is a sermon all the week." The "living epistle" of Paul was as sublime and convincing as any words that fell from his lips on the hill of Mars; for Jesus Christ lived in him. Our people look at us when out of the pulpit to discover what we mean when in our pulpits. Piety is power. Your aim is to produce Christian character, and what argument so strong, so constant, so pervasive, so heart-reaching as the beautiful example of a life copied even imperfectly after Jesus Christ?

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

JOY A CHRISTIAN DUTY.

BY JAMES E. C. SAWYER.

There is a deeply-rooted idea in the minds of many people that Christianity is a religion of gloom. More than one great thinker has called it the religion of sorrow, and poets, who delight in things bright and beautiful, sink into minor tones when they sing of religion. True it is that in a certain sense Christianity may legitimately be called the religion of sorrow. Its founder, the Lord Jesus Christ, was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Its symbol is a cross, significant of suffering and shame. The condition of its service is, "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me." Its triumphant disciples are those who have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Yet the joy of the Lord, underlying the sorrow of the Christian life, and often bursting out with a radiance which changes the sky from dull gray to glowing brightness, ought never to be forgotten. We are so apt to emphasize the sorrow as to obscure the joy. The sorrow is only accidental and transient, while the joy is essential and permanent. Even sorrow itself becomes the hand-maiden of joy when one learns the duty of being glad, for then we rejoice in the Lord always, knowing that in every experience perfect wisdom and love are present to make all things work together for good.

Both in the Old Testament and in the New religion is described as joyous in its character. The Hebrew economy was jubilant in its arrangements for worship, calling into play the music of harp, viol, tabret, cymbal, stringed instruments and organ. There was joy in the daily service of the Temple, and at the great feasts, when all the people kept holiday; the land was filled with gladness from mountain top to valley. Thus the Hebrews recognized the duty of being glad and put it into practice.

The teaching of the New Testament is no less emphatic. The very message of Christianity is the Gospel, the good news of redeeming love. Christianity was introduced by a summons of joy: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." On the night of His betrayal, when the shadows of the approaching crucifixion fell thick and fast, Christ gathered His disciples around Him and told them of the blessed mystery of their union to Him, ending with the striking declaration, "These words have I spoken to you that My joy may be in you." The purpose of the Christian life, as revealed in the teaching of our Lord and His apostles, is to fill heart and life with the joy of Christ. When the believer realizes that truth he quickly apprehends the privilege and duty of being glad, and soon he walks in the sunshine of a joy which cannot be banished by the fog of human doubts or the clouds of earthly trials.

Cheerfulness is always an element of strength. The joy of the Lord is the strength of every true Christian. Joy is the law of the kingdom of heaven—in that kingdom light is sown for the righteous and gladness for the upright in heart. This joy is no transient feeling, born of the mood of the moment and clouded by the change of emotions, but a divinely-sustained principle based upon an abiding assurance. True it is that this joy has its times of rapture and ecstasy when heaven seems specially near and glimpses of the beatific vision are caught. Then the joy becomes unspeakable and full of glory. But these upliftings to the seventh heaven are rare and cannot be expected often, whereas the calm gladness of peace and communion ought to be the constant condition of the soul of every believer.

Gloomy Christians repel; sunny Christians attract. We are the world's Bible, and men judge the religion we profess by us who profess it. If we are dull and sad in our intercourse with our fellows, can we wonder at their blaming our religion? What we need today in our Christian life is a baptism of gladness that shall send us on our way with shining faces and jubilant praise. Rejoicing in the Lord, we should recommend Christianity by the winsomeness of our words and deeds. In the worry and strain of our generation no more welcome strength could come to any life than the abiding gladness of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. The surface of life may be troubled with a passing storm, but eternal peace will dwell in the heart. Our stream in the desert may be embittered by a Marah, but there will always be a sweetening tree at hand. We may be brought into our garden of Gethsemane, but there will always be an angel near to comfort and strengthen. Why, then, be sad? Should we not cast all gloom, born of doubt and fear, far from us, and live out full and happy lives in the sunshine of faith?

Williamstown, Mass.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

"LET NO MAN DESPISE THEE." *

In his relation to the world, the servant of God stands in need of two very important qualifications—confidence in his apprehension of truth, and self-respect. In almost any calling in life these are to a certain extent needful. Without confidence in his calling a man is apt to fail; without self-respect he deserves to fail. In no sphere of action should one be more earnest in his search after truth than in the service of Jesus Christ; and in none should he be more sincere in its defense. Yet the danger of fanaticism on the one hand, and of extreme liberalism on the other, must be carefully avoided. Fanaticism cannot well consist with the clearest apprehension of truth, nor ultra-liberalism with its sincerest defense. The times are such as demand of every one wearing the badge of Christian profession a clear, definite testimony to the truth he has received; and the world looks to see this testimony backed up by a life in harmony with the truth professed. Every disciple is therefore, if he will but see it, placed upon his honor, and is duty bound to exhibit to the world the transforming power of the grace of God. A failure in this respect to measure up in some degree at least to what the world expects of the follower of Jesus Christ, not only fails to win men to Christ, but excites their contempt for His faithless disciple.

There are three considerations which should lead us to have a perfect confidence in our apprehension of Truth, and in consequence should inspire in us the highest degree of self-respect. The first of these is, that Truth is one as God is one. One man may have a clearer understanding of it than another; one may see some portion of Truth that another does not see; he may perceive some relation between fact and fact, between principle and principle, that to his neighbor is incomprehensible; yet it is the same Truth; and, as drops of water lose themselves in the ocean, so these different perceptions of what is true, when viewed from the standpoint of universal experience, are seen to blend into one great ocean of truth, illimitable, unfathomable, eternal. Then, if I have caught some gleams of truth, as my profession in Christ affirms that I have, I am, to the extent of my apprehension of it, in touch with the Infinite. And because of such relation I may rest in perfect confidence that as I yield myself to the power of Truth it will make me free; and, so far as it reaches my life and transforms it, I am free. For Truth does transform the life as the light of the sun transforms the face of nature.

A second consideration is that Truth is the foundation of righteousness. The doctrines of Jesus Christ are a revelation of Truth, as He Himself is a revelation of God. The transformation wrought in man by the reception of Truth, in the light of which is seen his relation to God and his duty to his fellow-man, finds its proper and legitimate manifestation in holiness and righteousness—holiness as regards the moral condition of the heart and its attitude before God, righteousness as regards the outward life and conduct before men. That as men see and feel Truth to be Truth, and believe that it applies to them, it does produce a thirst for heart purity and a zeal for righteousness, is not only evident from the history of every religious movement, but also capable of demonstration in my own experience. So as I receive Truth a longing for purity is begotten within me, and I feel myself moved to a life of righteousness. Hence, as a follower of Christ, I am partaker of His life; I have experience of the same divine power that throbbed in Him; the righteousness of His daily walk is the pattern of mine. And because of this relationship with Him, I again feel myself in touch with the Divine and Infinite; and in my soul is begotten a confidence in the final supremacy of right.

The third consideration is the dignity of Truth, and, by consequence, the dignity of the call to promulgate it. As Truth is One, great and infinite, the foundation of righteousness, so it is noble and possesses a dignity all its own. In proportion to the extent of his vision of Truth is a man inspired to a life of true nobility; and as it enters into his ideal so will he make his deeds conform to its law, and his whole career will be a search for the realization in his own spirit of the beauty, purity and dignity revealed to him from the mount of vision. And as the vision becomes reality to him he will feel himself called to proclaim to his fellowman the truth he has discovered.

These considerations lead us to conclude that not only the minister of Christ, but every believer as well, should have the highest confidence in his vision of Truth, and that because of his espousal to its cause he is under obligation to maintain the highest possible degree of self-respect. There is danger, however, that we grow somewhat indifferent in these respects: hence the admonition of the apostle. He would incite us to an examination of ourselves. We should so demean ourselves that none shall find any occasion of stumbling in us. Our conduct toward men should be such that though they may cast out our names as evil, yet the Truth we declare shall find a response in their hearts.

* Synopsis of a sermon delivered at Onaway, Mich., by J. R. Hawkins.

A danger lies here that the disciple must guard against. In the effort to establish and maintain confidence in our vision of Truth we are apt to have the attention so diverted that we place confidence in our ability to see rather than in the thing seen. This attitude with respect to any truth is but a step short of fanaticism, and instead of winning men drives them away. On the other hand, the desire to avoid the charge of narrowness may lead to an extreme in the other direction. So, while having the utmost confidence in the Truth, because of the lack of sufficient courage to declare it, we are not made free.

Fanaticism has this in its favor, that it is always marked by courage and boldness; approbateness, on the other hand, has this against it, that it is always accompanied by moral laxity, violation of conscience and loss of self-respect. The world hates a fanatic, but despises one who truckles and cringes. The fanatic has this to his credit—he does not violate his conscience; and when all else is gone, he still has character left. The seeker after popularity has nothing left.

What is especially needed to-day is an awakening of conscience among professors so that there shall be a revival of Christian living. A reformation that will bring Christian practice up in line with Christian profession will do more to convince the world of Christ's power to save than all the anthems we can sing, or all the parties we can give, and would be far more acceptable to God. We need a revival of those strong, sturdy principles that made the Puritan, and the Quaker, and the Methodist, famous in the day of their power—principles that will lead a man to act as though he must give to God an account of his stewardship. A man guided by such principles the world may hate, but cannot despise.

To bring about such a reform as this should be our aim as a Church. "Let no man despise thee" applies to every member. Let us scrutinize every motive, every action, every affection, in the light of divine Truth; and if it will not bear the test, if there is in it the least bit of selfishness, or the least sign of world-pleasing or man-fearing, we should bring it into judgment and start from a new standpoint. Let us see to it that the world can have no cause or occasion to hold the Church in contempt because of our inconsistency. Souls are too precious to be trifled with. Time is too short to allow of anything. "Let no man despise thee," but assert thyself against the follies of thy own heart: and the world will be compelled to respect thee. "Let no man despise thee," but honor the Truth which hath found thee, and which thou hast beheld: and men will behold and honor thee. "Let no man despise thee," but control the citadel of thine own soul: and men will yield themselves unto thee; and thou shalt lead them on to a conquest like thine. Both thou and they shall reign in the palace of thine own self-hood far above the reproach of the vile, secure alike from the attack of the scorner and the mockery of the hypocrite.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

A MODERN QUAKER.

BY AMELIA M. GUMMERE.

Few more delightful books are to be met with this season than the comely volume in which the letters and memoir of John Bellows are given to the public by his widow.* The book is the unconscious record of a type of character, as rare as it is delightful, and demonstrates in a most illuminating way how the conscientious Quaker may best adapt his Quakerism to the needs of modern times.

John Bellows came of good old Non-conformist stock, of Cornwall and Dorsetshire. Through the influence of their friends, the parents of the statesman, W. E. Forster, his own parents became Friends, his father being a schoolmaster of force and ability among that people. Apprenticed when only 14 to the printers' trade, John Bellows's talents had a natural means of outlet for the expression of his many philanthropic ideas, as the growth of his business placed large means and opportunity in his hands. At the age of 20 he says, "the realities of life" made him question the truths of Quakerism, and, after tending in the direction of the church ritual, it came to him, as it had done to Elizabeth Fry, to test the doctrines of Quakerism before throwing them over. He says: "I read Barclay's arguments especially, and with them the texts both of the Old and of the New Testaments which he cites, till, after many anxious days and nights, the light shone on them steadily and brightly, as the sun in a cloudless sky, and I was made as sure of the truth of what the world calls Quakerism as I was of my own existence." He also became convinced of the necessity for upholding the "minor testimonies," and he adopted the plain coat and speech as well.

From this time on, despite the demands of a growing business, John Bellows's life is one long record of public-spirited effort. He was in France, near Metz, on an errand of peace, during the Franco-Prussian war; in Russia, where, as companion to J. J. Neave, he went in 1892, in the effort to relieve the Stundists and discover the true facts of Russian persecution; and in 1896 he went to Armenia on a similar errand of relief. A second Russian visit was made in 1900, and on both occasions he visited Count Tolstoi. Their tender spirits were dipped into much sympathy, although he could not agree with those peculiar views of Tolstoi's to which Ambassador White has also taken exception, such as dispensing with all government, including the constabulary, and the communal ownership of property. But in many points, particularly that of the Quaker doctrine of the Inner Light, they were at one, and tears of joy ran down the Russian's face as they talked. John Bellows's love for little children and his charming naturalness is shown in his romps with the little Tolstoys, making him homesick for the "chases" with his own children, so charmingly described in a letter to his intimate friend, Oliver Wendell Holmes, here too long to quote.

John Bellows's remarkable independence of conviction was a striking feature of his character. This, coupled with fearless courage and sincerity, led sometimes to his being misunderstood, as it had done with John Bright, and many more. He said himself, "Unity of spirit does not lie in holding the same views of things, or learning the same outward lessons; but in our loving and cherishing the truth in whatever direction it is made manifest to us." (p. 376.) He had keen sensibilities and a vivid imagination. The emotional effect of chiming bells when heard far from home, as in Russia, moved him to tears. His appreciation of the sufferings of cattle on the Atlantic transports so wrought upon him that this is given as his reason for becoming a vegetarian. Later on, even fish were declined. John Bellows drew people to him through the gift of personal charm, when his conversation, apparently without conscious effort, was maintained on high levels, which drew out in turn the best response. He could acknowledge a mistake with perfect candor, as in 1900, writing on another subject, he says, "Nearly forty years ago I made two serious mistakes—one in attacking John Bright, and the other in imagining that the Southern States of America were struggling for their proper rights. I have long since been sorry for these mistakes, and have said so."

In 1901 John Bellows was one of the delegation to present the address from the Quakers to King Edward VII. on his accession. In the summer of that year he and his wife visited America. At the Harvard commencement the honorary degree of A.M. was conferred upon him for his French dictionary and his essays on Roman antiquities in Britain. He renewed a lifelong friendship with Senator Hoar, and met the son of his old friend, Dr. Holmes, visiting Whittier's home and concluding the visit where it began, at the home of Joseph S. Elkinton, in Philadelphia, with whom he had worked in connection with the Doukhobors.

The length and variety of the list of John Bellows's publications will show how great were his intellectual activities. These did not prevent him, nevertheless, from active interest in political work in his own neighborhood, another point not dwelt upon in the volume under notice, but leading to misunderstandings, some of which in his life had caused temporary withdrawal from his work, as during the short period of his resignation from Friends; he was reinstated again when wiser counsels prevailed. Possibly the points on which John Bellows did not always agree with his fellows may teach a lesson to all good Quakers who have their individual notions of that elusive thing, "consistency." The book is wisely edited with taste and skill calculated to appeal to and interest a wider public than the limited number found among Friends. It is such books as these, with a literary flavor and a high spiritual "note" that are of service among us to-day. We cannot help regretting that the subject of the volume did not have a university education, with which he must have become a leading archæologist and antiquary of his day. His intimate friend, Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, knew and appreciated his work, and another learned friend, Dr. Hübner, of Berlin, urged him to publish a monograph on the antiquities of Gloucester, which, however, he never found time for. One thing he was not—an artist; and it is rather a pity that the pen sketches were included. This brief notice cannot be better closed than with the words of Dr. Holmes to John Bellows in a letter written in 1891:

"We thanked God that there are such sweet, intelligent, receptive natures as yours, whose touch transfigures the common objects of life and throws an ideal atmosphere round them without destroying their nature."

SHALL WE HAVE A YEARLY MEETING?

BY W. M. PERRY.

[There is now under consideration a proposition to set off from Iowa Yearly Meeting a new yearly meeting in Nebraska. The proposition will be laid before the approaching Iowa Yearly Meeting. The following article from the "Nebraska Friend" will be read with interest. W. M. Perry was formerly clerk of Ohio Yearly Meeting.—Ed.]

There is one action of the Association that demands careful and prayerful consideration by Friends in Nebraska. I refer to the request made by the Association that the quarterly meetings consider the thought of asking that a yearly meeting be established in Nebraska. Such a request should not be made without a very careful consideration of the responsibilities to be assumed and carried by a yearly meeting. May we suggest that in all the quarterly meetings where the matter is to be considered the Friends come to a decision with a full realization of the added responsibility, but at the same time may it be decided with a hope, born of faith in our Master's leading, that our opportunities for the spread of His kingdom and the enlargement of the borders of our beloved church may be greatly enhanced by the establishment of a yearly meeting.

There are a few things which should have special bearing upon the conclusion to be reached:

1st. Is there a sufficient number of Friends to compose a yearly meeting? By an examination of the last minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting we find there are five quarterly meetings which are considered in the Association, with a membership of 1,295. There are also three or more monthly meetings in Colorado which have been invited to join with us in this request, which at a conservative estimate should make at least 1,500 members. This would make a yearly meeting relative in size with each of the following yearly meetings: Canada, Oregon, Baltimore and California. I see also from statistics (of 1899) that California and Oregon have each only two quarterly meetings, Dublin and Canada three, and Baltimore and Wilmington four, while we, including the Colorado meetings, will have six quarterly meetings in Nebraska. All of these Friends are practically isolated from yearly meeting on account of the distance to Oskaloosa.

2d. The reflex action upon a religious body from meeting together in an annual meeting is wonderful. All go down to their several fields of work with a renewed zeal, and acting under a special anointing of God that comes to a body of believers who have met in the name of their common Lord. Each is ready to do better service for the Master.

3d. One of the greatest blessings that comes to a body of people is when they feel the added responsibility that comes to them by undertaking, in the name of the Lord, a given task, or some great work, without the assistance and counsel of those on whom they have depended in other days. The latent talent, the progressive energy and the consecrated life of Friends in Nebraska need just such a responsibility.

4th. The establishment of a yearly meeting in Nebraska will bring directly to us, as nothing else can, the fact of our accountability for the salvation of the vast numbers of souls in this great Western field and their instruction in righteousness.

5th. Nothing has characterized Friends more than their loyalty to their educational institutions. We have especially admired the perfect loyalty of Iowa Yearly Meeting to Penn College. By her moral and financial support she has built up one of the strongest educational institutions in the West. In Nebraska we have a college that, with its equipment, is doing work second to none. Educational men have been surprised at the curriculum which it sustains. The classical and scientific courses suffer nothing by being compared with those in colleges of years of standing. The character of the work done by the seven professors last year is shown in the lives of the students who were under their care. The deep religious spirit, both with teacher and pupil, is very marked. The future of Friends in Nebraska largely clusters around the college. But every successful Friends' college must be nurtured and sustained by some yearly meeting. Nebraska Central College has a wide range of territory from which to draw students. Many of our young people will never get a college education unless they get it here. The life of the church and the college are identical. The college, to succeed, must have the loyal support of a yearly meeting to sustain it.

Has not the time come to take the initial steps for a yearly meeting in Nebraska?

FRIENDS JUDGED BY THEIR FRUITS.

[The following letter, addressed to the editor of "The Public Ledger" (Phila.), appeared in that paper Eighth month 2d, under the title, "The Society of Friends."—Ed.]

In common with a multitude of Philadelphians, I regard the Friends (or Quakers), as a religious body, the best type of Christianity in existence, and yet, it seems to me, they are passing away, like the Indians.

It is universally admitted that a nation exclusively of consistent Quakers could easily dispense with human law and lawyers, courts and judges, policemen's clubs and soldiers' bayonets, jails and penitentiaries, lunatic asylums and breweries, and, of course, gambling "joints" and other dens of iniquity would be totally unknown.

In short, the Friends teach and practice the Golden Rule, the fundamental principle of the religion of Jesus. This, together with their faith in the "spirit," or "inner light," make them conspicuous examples of what is termed the "beauty of holiness."

While all this is an admitted fact, the question follows, What would become of the thousands who live by preying on their fellow-men should, by some miracle, the Quakers secure control of, say, this one city? Fancy the situation: No dens of vice of any kind; no gamblers' hells; no rum holes or champagne clubs; no political machines or tricky politicians; no shyster lawyers or divorce courts; no policemen, or jails, or paupers; and, above all, no necessity of a "warrior bold" in the entire land.

I say, fancy such a condition! Should such a state of affairs prevail, what would become of a vast multitude of "toilers"—policemen, judges, petty magistrates, an army of lawyers, politicians for revenue only, newspaper reporters of the scavenger brand, and a horde of criminals of every grade who live by vice and who cling to the decent minority of our citizens like barnacles to a stranded ship in some far-off deserted port?

What would happen should this multitude be suddenly compelled to earn a living by doing a fair day's work for common wages? Why, anarchy (as we understand the phrase) would prevail sure!

But, "fortunately," there is seemingly no danger of virtue triumphing over vice—not on this planet, anyway. Quite the reverse, as the old monster, "vice," in its various forms, still "holds the fort," with every evidence of being powerful enough to defy any combination of Christians to dislodge it or unfasten its grip on the majority of mankind.

And now that the "old guard" of morality and the "Golden Rule" (the Friends) are passing away, slowly, but surely, where can we look for any organization to take its place as exemplars of the teachings of the Man of Nazareth? "By their fruits ye shall know them!" Judged by this incontrovertible standard of all things human or divine, the Friends lead all brands of religion on the lines laid down by Jesus, the Christ, who is regarded by millions as the eternal and animating spirit of the universe. If this be a fact that Jesus was and is the eternal and animating force of the universe, which is summed up in the word of God, then, in the name of justice, equity, reason and common understanding, why should such models of Christian ethics as the Quakers be permitted to pass away as an organization, while vice, in all its hideous forms, runs rampant throughout the universe?

THE WOODBROOKE SETTLEMENT FOR RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL STUDY.

The attention of members of the Society of Friends and others is earnestly called to the opportunity afforded for religious and social study at the above Settlement, which is under the care of a committee consisting of members of the Society of Friends of London Yearly Meeting.

The object of the Settlement is not that of a theological college, to train a special class for the work of ministry, but to provide for any who wish for it the means of better equipment, both intellectual and spiritual, for religious and social work of any kind.

The atmosphere of Woodbrooke is devotional, and the tone warmly Christian. The Bible and religious history are studied with reverence, and at the same time in a spirit of freedom from dogmatic fetters.

The Settlement is in the country, a few miles from Birmingham, and is in the center of much active religious and social work carried on by members of the Society of Friends.

The committee specially ask that the advantages to be gained by residence at Woodbrooke shall be carefully weighed by young men. The conclusion of a college career, or of a business engagement, may offer facilities for a brief residence in England. The fee is at present 25 shillings (or about $6) weekly.

A Friend has generously placed at the disposal of the committee six scholarships of the value of £15 (or about $75) per term, for the benefit of American students of both sexes (being members of any branch of the Society of Friends), to whom such assistance may be a matter of importance. Friends desiring to avail themselves of these scholarships should apply to the warden, giving as full information as possible, and adding the names of one or two Friends to whom the committee may refer.

The course of study is under the general direction of Dr. J. Rendel Harris, who is assisted by competent lecturers and tutors.

All particulars may be obtained by application to the warden, William Littleboy, Woodbrooke, Selly Oak, Nr. Birmingham, England.

The following is the program of lectures, etc., autumn term, 1904:

J. Rendel Harris, M.A., D.Litt. (director of studies).—"The Mystics" or "Early Christian Hymns," "The Library of Our Lord and His Apostles." Greek Testament (advanced).

Robert S. Franks, M.A., B.Litt.—"The Book of Job," "The Epistle to the Romans," "Comparative Religion," "The Life and Teaching of Augustine."

A. Neave Brayshaw, B.A., LL.B.—"The Early History of the Hebrews" (introductory to a course on the prophetic literature).

Herbert G. Wood, B.A.—"Church History, Second Century—The Church and the Empire." Greek Testament (elementary).

George Shann, M.A.—"The Spiritual Principle of Man's Knowledge and Conduct," "Scope and Method of Economics, and the Promotion of Public Welfare by the State."

T. Bryan, M.A.—"Joseph Mazzini—His Social and Political Teaching."

First-day, Eighth mo. 21.—Reward of faithfulness. Rev. 3: 7-13.

Time.—Not long after the last lesson, about 870 B.C.

Place.—Mount Carmel, near its summit.

Rulers.—Ahab and Jezebel, king and queen of Israel; Jehoshaphat, king of Judah; Benhadad II., king of Syria.

Parallel account.—There is no parallel in Chronicles, but see Jas. 5: 17, 18.

The account of the whole scene on Mount Carmel should be read. 1 Kings 18: 17-46. "There could have been no scene in the land of Israel more strikingly suitable for the purpose than Mount Carmel. It is a ridge . . . which at the eastern extremity rises more than 1,600 feet above the sea, sinking down to 600 feet at the western extremity." Elijah's altar was reared almost certainly upon the high eastern extremity, from which a fine view both of the sea and of the plain of Esdraelon could be obtained. There are few more dramatic incidents in the Bible than that of Elijah upon Carmel.

30. "And Elijah said unto all the people." After all that had taken place as narrated in the preceding verses. "He repaired the altar of the Lord that was thrown down." R. V. This shows that there had been an altar to Jehovah here. It was probably one of those thrown down by order of Ahab and Jezebel (1 Kings 19: 10). This verse seems to be inconsistent with verse 32, and the difference is hard to explain satisfactorily.

31. "Twelve stones." One for each tribe of Israel. Compare Josh. 4: 5. "Israel shall be thy name." That is, the name of all the tribes taken together.

32. "Built an altar in the name of the Lord." An altar to Jehovah, the God of the Israelites, and in contradistinction to the altar which had been reared in honor of the false god, Baal. "As great as would contain too measures of seed." It is impossible to speak with any certainty of these measures, or the size of the trench. The fact about which there is no doubt is that the trench was large enough to contain enough water to do away with the suspicion of fraud.

33. "Put the wood in order." Compare Lev. 1: 8. "Laid it on the wood." R.V. Everything was done as prescribed by the law. "And he said, fill four water-jars with water." American R. V. There were no barrels in those days, and the Hebrew word is properly translated "jars," as elsewhere. The jars were doubtless such as those which the women carry on the head. The question has naturally been asked, "Where could so much water have been obtained in the time of so great a drought?" The answer is, it must have come from a perennial spring in the mountain. Such a one still exists. "The burnt sacrifice." Better, as in R. V., "Burnt offering."

34. Elijah was determined to anticipate any possible charge of fraud. Note that twelve jars were emptied; this was probably symbolical of the twelve tribes of Israel.

35. The whole altar was drenched, and was surrounded with water.

36. "At the time of the offering of the coming oblation." R.V. This would be about 3 p.m. Elijah's object was to carry out the worship of Jehovah in all possible details so that the people might be reminded of the religion of Jehovah. "Elijah, the prophet." Note that he was not a priest, though he assumed the priestly offices in this case, just as Solomon had done at the dedication of the Temple.

37. "The prayer of Elijah contains two petitions: (1) for the vindication of his own prophetic authority; a final proof that he had all along acted in accordance with the will of God, and (2) for the bringing back of the nation to faith in the one true God."

38. The consuming was complete. Nothing but a miracle would have convinced the people. "A miracle is an event which cannot be explained by any known laws of nature." Those who are not willing to accept the occurrence here described as a miracle would practically have to consider the whole of the history of Elijah as legendary.

39. "Fell on their faces." This was a truly oriental practice. Compare Lev. 9: 24; 2 Chron. 7: 3. "The Lord, he is God." Literally, Jehovah, he is God.

40. "The prophets of Baal." The whole 450. The brook Kishon, which flowed at the foot of the mountain towards the sea. It was here that Sisera was conquered by Barak (Judges 4: 7; 5: 21). Probably that the stream might carry off the dead bodies. The people must have helped Elijah. Elijah could hardly have slain all with his own hand; what was done by his command is spoken as being done by him, as "Wellington conquered Napoleon." It seems a cruel and vindictive act of Elijah, but it was quite in accord with the character of the times. Compare the statements in the Psalms (e. g., Ps. 137: 7-9; 139: 19, etc.) Besides this, the people would not have understood milder treatment.

41. "Said unto Ahab." Ahab has not been mentioned before. "Get thee up." From Kishon to Carmel. "Sound." Probably of the wind.

42. "Eat and drink." It is not quite clear what these words signify; whether a feast, or whether mockery or something else.

42. "Bowed himself down upon the earth," etc. The attitude of extreme reverence. It is clear from verse 44 that Elijah went to a different part of the mountain from Ahab.

43. "Seven." An indefinite number. Compare Ps. 12: 6; 119: 164; Prov. 24: 16.

44. "That the rain stop thee not." The plain of Jezreel is full of watercourses, which would fill suddenly in a heavy rain.

45. "In a little while, that the heaven was black." R. V. The drought was over. Jezreel, the city in the plain of the same name.

46. The distance to Jezreel was about seventeen or eighteen miles. No reason is given for the feat of Elijah; it can only be conjectured that it was to confirm the supernatural power of the prophet.

"Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen."

Though Luther had friends present when he spoke these words of noble defiance, he was surrounded by powerful and bitter enemies and well did he know that the unseen Power invoked was his chief and only sure protection. If we picture to ourselves the scene of the prisoner, even though under safe conduct, with the whole force of the Church from which he had come out arrayed against him and seeking his life, even by treachery, we can imagine with what an appreciation this great leader of the Reformation would afterwards write these closing verses of Romans 8.

Yet his chief danger was not physical, but spiritual. The fear that the Emperor could inspire was of one who could kill the body only. We have many times to decide what stand we shall take, not threatened, indeed, by the terrors of a cruel death, but allured by temptations whose hidden end is death.

Opportunities for conspicuous heroism in decision may be and probably will be few; but the records of the books that shall one day be opened must show for every one whose name is in the Book of Life, that at some time, and doubtless at many times, he made his resolve when only God was his support against what the world, if it could but know, would call great odds.

Standing with props and supports is no test of one's own character, but only proof of favorable surroundings. Whatever courage is manifested is in the environment rather than in Him who is within. We can no more truly stand without His infilling than can the empty sack without its contents.

So that, after all, we are never alone, even in the face of the multitudes that reject or cry out against the truth. It may be a little child in the home, or a little band in the neighborhood, or a little nucleus in the church, or a little party in the State; but if it stands for truth and right, it stands also for ultimate victory and blessedness, and the confusion of the fearful and unbelieving as well as of the hostile and persecuting.

MISSIONARY WORK IN CHINA.

Ku Ling, Sixth month 25th, 1904.

Dear Friends:

Owing to the death of Esther Butler's father, and the consequent calling home of our superintendent, it was thought best almost at the last moment that my wife and I should defer our home-going until fall, so as to avoid leaving Nanking station too seriously handicapped for workers during Esther Butler's temporary absence.

Our own work at Luh Hoh being closed, the hospital having already been rented for other purposes, and the new missionary, Janet Carmichael, occupying our room in the Luh Hoh Home, we were quite free to remain at Nanking.

Ever since coming to China I have been hoping that the time would come when I might be liberated from regular duty long enough to make a visit to some other important missionary centers, in order to get helpful ideas about conducting medical work and to study mission methods generally. All seemed to feel clear that the present was my opportunity. The hope of being able to build a hospital at Luh Hoh upon return from furlough in the fall of 1905 was a particularly strong incentive at this time.

Then there was a feeling that a little personal observation of the great work that is being carried on for God in the valley of the Yangtsi, would be a fresh inspiration and of practical benefit in our work.

The building of our new mission bungalow at Ku Ling had been intrusted to a contractor, and was just now needing attention, and being on my way it would be convenient to stop off and give it the needed care.

My leaving was delayed for some time by the rainy weather, but on the 25th of Fifth month I started for Nganking, a city of about 70,000 population on the south side of the river, some thirty hours' ride on the river steamers from Nanking. It was my pleasure while there to be entertained at the China Inland Mission's home for new missionaries. Here they are provided with every advantage for the study of the language and instructed in Chinese customs and missionary methods, until they are ready for regular appointment. In company with friend Gray, formerly a member of Iowa Yearly Meeting, a very highly esteemed friend of ours, I visited the various branches of Christian work in the city.

Protestant missionaries began their work in Nganking about thirty-five years ago, and although it was bitterly opposed at first, the succession of devoutly men who have preached the gospel on every street and in the principal tea houses of the city, have given foreigners a most enviable position in the estimation of the natives. As the city has just become an open port, the friends there may justly dread the influences of unscrupulous and unchristian commercial agents who are already putting in an appearance. I felt that the time spent there was particularly profitable to me, and that my visit was under the direction of the Holy Spirit.

My next stop was at Kiu-kiang, from which place I went up Ku-ling mountain and attended to the business matters connected with the mission house above mentioned. This being done, I started on again. Eighteen hours by river steamer brought me to Han-kow, the great commercial city of Central China. The three cities of Han-kow, Han-yang and Wu-chang are together often called the Chicago of China. Their arrangement, however, on either side of the river, and about the mouth of the river Han reminds me very much of the arrangement of Greater New York.

"Greater Han-kow" is the greatest inland center for missionary activity in Central China. The work is very largely under the care of English missionaries, a large number of whom are men of marked ability. Medical work has won for itself a place in the first rank among the various methods of evangelistic activities.

The London Missionary Society has a medical school now open, with seventeen young Christian men already in attendance. Hospital work is abundant and excellent in quality. Several of the missionary physicians there have acquired an expertness in surgery that might well be emulated by many in the homeland. I saw as much as I could in a week's time, gathering all the information I could on the subject of hospital construction, hoping, if God please, to do for our people in proportion to our strength what these men of God have done for theirs.

I rode out to Hsiao-gan, two and a half hours on the new Han-kow Peking Railroad, where I was privileged to see Dr. Henry Fowler's Leper Home. He has about sixty of these most pitiable creatures, comfortably housed, nursed, clothed and fed. He does not pretend to cure them, but is satisfied to see them made clean and fitted for the kingdom of God.

I was greatly impressed to see what foreigners had done to improve the condition of the people in these three cities. The work at which we are engaged is a mighty one. The evangelization of one third of the human race, within the limits of one single empire is worthy of the best talents of our time.

Our own work is small, to be sure, in comparison. You are represented in China by a single male worker, but we are comforted by the thought that it is not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts, "And again one shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight." We should not forget, however, that the fight here is far more unequal even than that, hence we need more men!

We are now expecting to sail in the early fall, and shall hope to be with you and talk these matters over together.

My wife and baby are now with me at Ku-ling. Pray for us that we may be built up physically and filled with all the fullness of God.

Yours eager for the coming of Christ's kingdom,
GEO. F. DE VOL.

Christianity is to-day the greatest power on earth and the most beneficent. The thrones of the whole world have not power to overthrow it. The world itself cannot reject or destroy it. Like the sun, it shines without asking permission, and human power is no less impotent to the blotting out of the one than unequal to the eradication of the other. The boundaries of empires will change; despotic thrones will chase each other to oblivion; new policies and potentates will rise upon the ruins of the old; names at which the world trembles, and altars at which it offers incense, will become unknown and crumble into nothing; but Christianity, surviving all and becoming more and more lustrous, must continue to lead on and lead out advancing civilizations, becoming itself not only the dominant but the one only power under heaven in whose name kings shall rule, and for the furtherance of whose ends policies shall prevail.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

A very great honor has come to Pacific College through the work of one of its students, Walter Miles. He has recently won the first place in the national oratorical contest at Indianapolis on "Prohibition." Altogether not less than 700 orations were prepared for the contest, and Walter Miles won all the way from the county to the State, and finally to the national contest. That is good work.

There will be a reunion of the old members of Timbered Hills Monthly Meeting, Cherokee County, Kansas, Eighth month 21st, 1904. This is one of the oldest organized meetings in this part of Kansas, and has some interesting history. All of the old members are invited to be present. Those who were members at any time 1868 to 1900 will be considered old members. If it is not possible to be present, please send a word of greeting or reminiscence to Frances Liter, or Elina C. Wheeler, Columbus, Kansas, R. R. 2.

In speaking of the army reduction, "The Friend" (London) says: "The scheme of (Sec. of War) Arnold-Foster is based on three main propositions—(1) that the army is much too large and costly; (2) that sweeping reductions in numbers and expenditure are feasible, and (3) that no large military force is required for home defence. Having shown that the total British army, exclusive of all colonial troops and of troops of the feudatory Princes of India, numbered 1,070,000 men, the Secretary of War frankly recognized that this gigantic total was unnecessary.

This is what Benjamin Trueblood says in "The Advocate of Peace" upon the war speech of Ex-Governor Black: "That is as astounding an utterance as has been heard in this country in recent years. The flash and roar of the rhetoric of the passage are so overwhelming that it is difficult to retain one's senses enough to perceive the meaning. But stripped of its rhetorical embellishments, the naked significance of it is: Nothing but war is supremely great. It is the final arbiter of the fate of nations. It is eternal. The horrible scenes of the battlefield, ghastly upturned faces and the mad charging of war horses, 'will always be.' Orderly tribunals of arbitration, like that at The Hague, with their learned judges, are poor sticks for a nation to lean upon. Education of school children for peace is nonsense. The prophecies of men of heart and the prayers for peace of saintly women whose lives have been blasted by war are stupid and powerless. Dreams of universal peace are as baseless and unrealizable as the silly fancies which come and go in a child's brain. The most fruitful and glorious thing a nation ever does is to wriggle and writhe on the deadly wire of war. And such amazing stuff as this is uttered on the eve of the great campaign for the election of the President of this great nation of eighty millions of intelligent people whom peace has made prosperous and mighty!"

DIED.

BLAIR.—At her home, in Newberg, Ore., Seventh month 24th, 1904, Jane H. (Jessup), wife of J. Kinley Blair, in her 66th year. In a thirty years' residence in Iowa, the deceased was always prominent in the work of the Friends' Church, serving Iowa Yearly Meeting as clerk for a number of years. Since 1891, when she moved to Newberg, Ore., she has always been active and efficient in Christian work. She was clerk of the Meeting for Ministry and Oversight for several years, and was always on the important committees of the monthly, quarterly and yearly meetings. Both as a public worker and a personal friend, hers was a character which will be missed in Oregon.

CURTIS.—At his home in La Valle, Wis., Fourth month 9th, 1904, Flavel Curtis, in advanced life. The deceased joined Friends in South Dakota in later life, and became a pillar in the meeting—abundant in labor for the upbuilding of the cause of truth. He, in company with his wife, did excellent pastoral work among Friends in South Dakota and later in Wisconsin. He was a savor of life, and a succorer of many, and died in the triumphs of faith in Christ.

HUNT.—At his home, Urbana, Ill., Sixth month 8th, 1904, Reuben G. Hunt, son of Thomas and Jane Hunt, aged 71 years. He filled many responsible positions in the meeting and Sabbath School, and served several years as an elder. His life was a beautiful testimony, and his departure was with full assurance of future reward.

NEAL.—At her home, in Wichita, Kan., Seventh month 9th, 1904, Marietta T. Neal, aged 73 years. She united in marriage with William T. Neal in 1872, and went to England with him in 1874. They worked together in a mission in London for one year, and traveled in evangelistic service for another year. They then returned to America, and united with Friends. After that they labored extensively in Kansas Yearly Meeting, in the ministry, spending three years in mission work, serving as pastors at several points and doing much as evangelists.

OLD-FASHIONED.

It is an ever new and interesting story to hear how one can be entirely made over by change of food.

"For two years I was troubled with what my physician said was the old-fashioned dyspepsia.

"There was nothing I could eat but 20 or 30 minutes later I would be spitting my food up in quantities until I would be very faint and weak. This went on from day to day until I was terribly wasted away and without any prospects of being helped.

"One day I was advised by an old lady to try Grape-Nuts and cream, leaving off all fatty food. I had no confidence that Grape-Nuts would do all she said for me, as I had tried so many things without any help. But it was so simple I thought I would give it a trial she insisted so "Well, I ate some for breakfast, and pretty soon the lady called to see her 'patient,' as she called me, and asked if I had tried her advice.

"Glad you did, child; do you feel some better?"

"No," I said, "I do not know as I do, the only difference I can see is I have no sour stomach and come to think of it I haven't spit up your four teaspoons of Grape-Nuts yet."

"Nor did I ever have any trouble with Grape-Nuts then or any other time, for this food always stays down and my stomach digests it perfectly; I soon got strong and well again, and bless that old lady every time I see her.

"Once an invalid of 98 pounds I now weigh 125 pounds, and feel strong and well, and it is due entirely and only to having found the proper food in Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co.,

Japan has now taken its place among rived in Seoul, with two assistants.

The assassination of the Russian Minister of the Interior, Von Phleve, which occured recently, has been an occasion for agitating Cabinet reform in that country. It has been the desire of a number of the Russian statesmen to have a responsible Cabinet. After some consideration, however, the reform has been vetoed by Czar Nicholas, and the present order of things will doubtless continue. The only question now to be settled is who will succeed Von Phleve.

There is much excitement in Morgan County, Ohio, over what is believed to be a new and rich oil field. Experts declare the product to be of the first grade.
An average of 90,000 barrels per day is flowing. All available land is being leased or purchased, and 300 wells are in operation, pumping, it is said, from 100 to 500 barrels of oil per day. Two thousand oil speculators are camping out in the new field. Twenty drilling machines are at work in the section, with more arriving.

President Charles W. Eliot says: "The attempted enforcement of uniform wages for all journeymen in the same trade is one of the gravest mistakes of the trade unions, so far as the pursuit of happiness is concerned. It ignores the infinite diversity of local conditions and surroundings, as well as of personal capacity, ties up the ambitious workman, cuts off from employment the weak, the dull and the old, who cannot earn the uniform wage, and in general interferes with the reasonable liberty of the employed and with their prospect of improving their lot."

In Manchuria is has been the Russian policy to hold on as long as possible and then retreat northward, making the advance of the Japanese as costly as possible. On the other hand, the Japanese have sought to build up an army which would enable them to cut off the retreat and overwhelm the Russian army. There has been some very heavy fighting during the past week, but nothing decisive has been reported. The forces about Port Arthur are advancing slowly. Nearly all the outer defenses have been captured, but the garrison is in communication with Newchwang, from which they receive food and artillery supplies.

Galveston is to be congratulated upon the completion of its sea-wall, which cost $1,500,000 and is three miles in length.
This, however, is but the beginning of the great improvement which the enterprising gulf port has undertaken, for the city itself is to be raised 17 feet, a work which will require two years and will cost over $2,000,000. Not only will this prevent a recurrence of the terrible disaster which overwhelmed the city, but it will unquestionably make Galveston a much more salubrious city. It is interesting to remember that a large part of Chicago was lifted bodily out of the wild onion marshes that gave its name—but that was before the days of skyscrappers.

Choice lands, requiring neither irrigation nor fertilizer, are not to be found in large tracts any more; but Uncle Sam is still a landed proprietor. There are unappropriated 380,979,307 acres of surveyed public lands and 591,976,169 acres of unsurveyed lands, or a total of more than 970,000,000 acres. Much of this land is unfit for agricultural purposes, but it has been estimated that when all the reclaimable lands shall be irrigated under the recent Irrigation act the new lands alone will be capable of sustaining a population equal to the total in the United States to-day. The policy of the government under this law is to sell the reclaimed lands to settlers and to use the proceeds for further irrigation work; thus it will be cumulative in its results, and in a few years the reclamation of lands which is now in its beginnings will be greatly hastened. The government engineers are planning work on a large scale in Idaho, State of Washington, Wyoming, Montana, Nevada,

Southern California, Colorado, Arizona,
New Mexico, Western Kansas and Utah. The first actual work of construction is on the Tonto Basin dam, near Phoenix, Arizona, which is to irrigate
250,000 acres and to cost about $3,000,- 000. On the San Pedro river, in Southwestern Arizona, 300,000 acres will be irrigated in one tract and 400,000 in another, besides many smaller tracts to be reclaimed within the next few years. In another project the Colorado river will be utilized to irrigate a 400,000-acre tract, which will support 10,000 families.

"Another tragedy," said the cynic, as shrill shrieks arose from the ruined cistern. "I suppose there is a woman at the bottom of it."—Yale Record.

THE OUTLOOK'S SEVENTEENTH EDUCATIONAL NUMBER.

The August magazine number of "The Outlook" is devoted very largely to educational topics, as has been the custom of this periodical for many years. Notable among the special illustrated features is the article by President Slocum, of Colorado College, on "The World's Fair as an Educative Force." This is illustrated by a remarkable series of fine photographs of scenes at the St. Louis World's Fair, taken expressly for this purpose by Arthur Hewitt. The present summer has marked the expiration of fifty years of service by President Eliot to Harvard University, and appropriately "The Outlook" this month prints an article on "The Personality of President Eliot," by Mark Sullivan. Still other articles in this issue are: "The Influence of the French School and Home," by Georgia Fraser, with reproductions of paintings of French school children by Jean Goffory; "A School in the Woods," by Martha Berry; "A Memorial to College Friendship" (the new dormitory at Princeton), by Robert Bridges; illustrated brief articles about the Greek Theatre at the University of California and the Harvard Stadium; a charming story of life in Labrador, by Norman Duncan; an instalment of Stewart Edward White's "The Mountains," dealing with "Trout, Buckskin and Prospectors." There are also numerous portraits and the usual reportorial, editorial and critical departments.

Mortgages Net 6% in North Dakota

THEY are the best, gilt-edged, rock-ribbed, guaranteed 6% investment in America. Safe as government bonds and pay better.

I have been selling these mortgages for 18 years, and have never had to foreclose, and never lost a cent of principal or interest for a single customer.

I personally know every farm covered by the mortgages, as well as the farmers giving them. I know them both to be right, or I have nothing to do with them. Their land is increasing in value every day, thus increasing the value of the security.

I collect both the interest and principal free, and remit in New York exchange, without the least trouble or bother of the customer.

I will be pleased to put you in the way of finding out all about me. Write me for further information.

*Ah yes, and then! How shall the winner fare
After the struggle, the restraint, and stress?
Shall he delude his soul with uselessness,
After his answered prayer?*

*How shall he quit who yesterday bestowed
All he was worth of valor and of vim
To gain the garden peace that seemed to him
Fruitage of all he sowed?*

A CALL TO YOUNG FRIENDS.

AS LIFE moves on, the years bring inevitable changes. Every new occasion gives its new call. As the scenes shift, certain doors close forever behind us, other doors open before us. We have some little part in deciding what we shall do and what we shall be, but only very little. We are—each of us—very small parts of a very great world. The urgent needs all about us, the great movements in which we find ourselves—these things are here without any choice of ours, and they are too large for us to master.

We wake up some day and rub our eyes as we discover that some old door through which we have always gone has been closed, some old custom which has held sway for a hundred years is breaking down. Some method which has always worked will no longer do for the new occasion. The most natural thing to do, is to try to hold the old door open. But if God is shutting it, that effort will be vain. It is like stopping the sweep of the tide when all the forces of gravitation are behind it.

What shall we do in the presence of these shutting doors? We must give up beating our heads against them and look for the doors which God is opening before us. The searcher for the North Pole often finds that, after all his efforts to get farther north his "observation" reveals the fact that he has lost rather than gained. What is the trouble? He was on an ice floe which was drifting south, and which defeated all his efforts. What does he do? He searches for the current setting north, and he puts himself on that! In short, he co-operates with eternal forces.

The one thing which is very clear is that we are not getting on in proportion to our efforts. The trouble partly is that we are trying to go through doors that have been divinely closed—that we are trying to go on in currents which are setting the other way. The first duty before us is to discover what doors God is opening for us—in which direction His tide is setting. That means that we must study the situation both within and without our own denomination. We cannot make progress in this present world if we depend on nothing but instinct and tradition. They are able to deal only with things as they have been, and we are compelled to deal with things as they are and as they will be in the future. That requires insight, which can come only through painstaking study of the facts.

For many years the work and the affairs of our branch of the Church were mainly in the hands of those who were elderly. Little use was made of those who were in the pith and vigor of life. These elderly Friends did the work most conscientiously, and they did it well. One thing they forgot to do. They forgot to train and prepare their successors. All over the country the "pillar" members have been dropping away one by one by death and old age, and we are left with a small array of leaders and with few members who know what Quakerism means, or what the divine line of march really is. One thing is sure. Heavy responsibilities are now coming upon the young Friends of the present, and immeasurable opportunities. God is opening doors for them, and they will mainly settle what the future of this Quaker movement will be.

The first thing for those of us who are favored to be still young is to get nearer the heart of the situation, (1) by studying our history, (2) by discovering our distinctive message, (3) by learning to understand the great religious currents which are to-day profoundly affecting human life and human history.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING IN OUR INSTITUTIONS.

THERE can be no question that the men and women who sacrificed and toiled to found and endow and equip the educational institutions of Friends believed that they were providing for the religious education of coming generations. They were, in many instances, broad-minded persons who saw the value of a sound general education, who appreciated the worth of culture, but deeper than any other desire was their aim to construct institutions which would supplement the home in training the children for lives of true spiritual service. This aim has not been kept steadily enough in view. Our institutions have done splendid work, and in most ways they have performed a work far beyond that which their founders foresaw.

But on the line of distinct religious training and education they have done less than was expected, and less than the need of the times demanded. Until very recent years there has been no adequate Bible teaching in any of our institutions—no Bible work which would compare with that done in Latin or chemistry. The children have gone out of these schools much more ignorant of the formation of the Apostolic Church than they were of Cæsar's Gallic wars. Even yet in most of our institutions the Bible is taught in a haphazard way. It receives nothing like the attention that the other literatures of the world receive. We talk of the banishment of the Bible from the public school, but we ourselves have shown very little eagerness to make this Book the permanent possession of every student who goes through one of our institutions. There is a cry everywhere for more efficient Sunday School teachers. It is even proposed to have normal schools to train these teachers. The graduates of our institutions ought to know how to do it without any further normal training. At present there are very few of our institutions where the students have the kind of training that would make them able in their turn to open the Bible to the eyes and minds of their pupils. This is a lack which should be remedied at once. It may be difficult to teach church history in all our institutions; it may not be best always to set forth the doctrines of Friends, but there is no excuse for the neglect of adequate and systematic teaching of the Holy Scriptures, in a manner which will make their marvelous power felt. This is a part of the mission of every Friends' institution.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

WE call the attention of our readers to the following editorial in the "Philadelphia Bulletin." Friends who have money to invest should beware of all plausible schemes, which they are unable to investigate; and they should get the advice of thoroughly reliable and disinterested persons before risking their savings:

THE IRRIGATION SWINDLE.

The swindling promoters have seized upon the irrigation fad from which to reap a dishonest harvest. Their favorite plan seems to be that of exploiting a section of worthless desert land lying adjacent to a district already under irrigation. Investors are invited to visit the land in question, and especially to investigate the amazing fertility of the nearest land actually irrigated. What is sedulously concealed from these visitors is the fact that the land upon which the swindling stock and bond scheme is founded lies outside of the possible zone of irrigation either from its elevation or because the water supply is insufficient.

Any piece of worthless desert land will furnish the basis of a swindling scheme of this sort, provided the intending investors are not sufficiently expert in engineering problems to detect the fraud for themselves. It is easy to see what irrigation does for the desert land that can be flooded periodically with water. It is a much more difficult thing for the ordinary visitor to determine the extent of the land in any locality subject to irrigation and herein lies the opportunity for defrauding the inexperienced.

The government has entered upon a scheme for irrigating desert lands, for which sufficient water can be impounded and utilized, and these lands will eventually be surveyed and offerred for sale with the full official assurance that they can be irrigated. It will be time enough for the public to invest its money when this has been done.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

EDUCATION AND SERVICE.

BY RUFUS M. JONES.

The first Friends' School which ever existed was established by George Fox, for boys and girls. It was his intention that they should be taught "everything civil and useful in creation." Just before his death he wrote to Friends in America: "Dear Friends and brethren that have gone into America and the islands thereaway, stir up the gift of God in you and improve your talents. Grow in the faith and grace of Christ that ye be not like dwarfs." This was good, healthy advice, and Friends throughout America lived up to it. Wherever they settled they built first of all a place to worship God in, and as soon as possible afterwards they raised money to build a school of some sort that their children might not grow up "dwarfs." The result is that every yearly meeting in America, with the exception of Baltimore, has at least one flourishing educational institution, and some of them have many. Our important men and women in every generation have pleaded and worked for education, and they have clearly seen that education and religion must not be separated.

There have undoubtedly been many saints of God who were densely ignorant, and there have just as certainly been many scholars who were not saints, but that does not alter the fact that the highest type of man is both a saint and a person who knows. The completest life is one which is rich in God and full of wisdom.

In the discussion which follows I shall try to answer the question: "What is the mission of education?" What can it do for us, or at least for our children?

The first fruit of education is a great increase in skill to do the world's work. The man who knows how can always do a thing better than a man who does not know how. Take such a humble task as milking a cow. Few things are simpler, if you know how, but the man who has not learned the trick simply cannot do it. Even the cow herself immediately discovers that an ignoramus is on the stool, and she shows her resentment by lashing him with her tail and by kicking over the pail or by stepping in it. Hardly any occupation suffers more from ignorance than does farming. Men have supposed that it required no special training, no acquired skill, to raise potatoes and corn and wheat. Quite the contrary is the case. Skill counts as much here as anywhere. A man who knows how can make a fortune on a hundred-acre farm, while the man who does not know how will never keep his taxes paid. Some day it will be discovered that intelligence and skill are just as important for the farmer as they are for the doctor and the bridge builder. The land has its secrets and its laws. To the man who only half knows these secrets and laws it gives only half a crop. It pours out all its riches on the man who knows how to do all his work wisely. It is pitiful to think how much of the earth's surface is now wasted, because we ignorantly till it. Ever since man was man the great forces of nature have been waiting to be used. But nobody knew how. Men crouched in dumb terror before the forces which we harness to our mills, our wagons and our cars. We touch a button and light our houses. We press a key and send a message around the world. We turn a lever and draw a loaded car up the steepest hills. All because we know how. The Esquimaux has no gain from all this, nor has the South Sea islander. He still lives in ignorance, and eats his blubber or his bread fruit.

The native doctors in Palestine know apparently nothing of the human body. They get up incantations to drive the demons out of the poor, sick man and are as likely to hasten his death as to cure him. Our physicians are marvels of skill. Thousands of lives are saved every day by skill which a generation ago was absolutely unknown. We have tunneled Alps, bridged the widest rivers, linked the severing seas, girdled the earth, turned the invisible into light, and made the stars in their courses fight for us. But all these triumphs are the fruit of education. They belong only to those who know how to use them. Wherever ignorance prevails these natural powers go to waste and man can have only what he masters by patient skill. Each year it becomes harder for an ignorant person to succeed at anything, and the world is going into the hands of those who know how to use its forces and its raw materials. But so far I have touched only the first fruits of education. It gives a mastery over the raw stuff of the world. It enables a man to tear down his barns and build greater. It increases one's power to reap where he has not sown and to gather where he has not strewn. In a word, education helps a man greatly in the honorable struggle to "make a living." But that is not what we are mainly here for. The real problem is, "How can I make a life?" Education must help us in solving this main problem of existence.

Everybody knows that a good body is an important element in the making of a life. The condition of the body counts tremendously on the soul and the mind. The inner and the outer are strangely tied up together. It is possible to divide a worm and get two good worms, but even the wisdom of Solomon could not divide a baby so as to get two babies; nor can the wisest modern educator divide a person into soul and body and deal with one-half alone. Education must deal with the whole man. It must not teach our sons Greek and yet leave them stoop-shouldered and flabby. It must not give the secrets of algebra to our daughters and yet turn them out hollow-chested and thin-blooded. Red corpuscles and good digestion are of inestimable value, not only for making a living, but no less for the battle with temptation and in all the business of making a life. Again and again an anemic body has been the beginning of deeper troubles. The old ascetic treated the body as though it were the devil's contribution to his make-up. The modern educator, who is fitted for his task, thinks of it as a possible temple of the Holy Ghost, and he puts it at its best.

"Thy body at its best," cries a great poet,

"Thy body at its best, how far can it project thy soul on its lone way?"

"As the bird wings and sings
Let us cry, 'All good things Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more now than flesh soul.'"

It is a great achievement to have a body which ministers to the spiritual nature and which has become the obedient instrument of the soul. No person is truly educated until his spirit has won over his body to its higher service.

The next thing which education must do toward the making of a life is to make the student acquainted with the intellectual gains of the ages. We gather up the tattered fragments of old papyrus in the hope of catching the secrets of a long-buried past. We are eager to see what aims and passions and hopes lay at the heart of men when the race was young. We dig for the broken bits of clay which reveal the purposes of the men of Assyria, because there is something kindred between their lives and ours. All history is sacred, because it reveals human struggles and the divine judgment working itself out in the rise and fall of men and races. We see where they blundered, and we learn from them how to apply ourselves unto wisdom. We study with awe the long attempts to spell out the secrets of nature, to let light into the mysteries of the universe. We see how each gain has made the next possible, until the little child knows many things which baffled Aristotle all his life, and the school-boy laughs at the astronomy which was Plato's best.

But education is much more than the mere acquisition of facts. It seeks from first to last to discipline and train the mind itself, so that it can deal successfully with new occasions and with new issues.

Furthermore, we shall not call a man educated until he has gained a largeness of view. It is worth something to be able to hug one fact or to see it straight, but the misery of it is that every fact is tied up with every other fact so that if you know only your one focus-point you do not know that! If you have not learned how to enrich your own view of truth in the light of other men's views, you must always suffer for it, and whether you realize it or not, the candle power, and probably the horse power, of your life will be correspondingly small. It is part of the mission of education to help toward the attainment of a largeness of view. With that, of course, goes the habit of open mind. He who has a great stone rolled over the entrance to his mind and whose one concern is to guard the stock of ideas already there has a kind of mental sepulcher from which there will be no resurrections without a miracle, and it becomes safe to have an open mind as soon as a person has formed a fine and sensitive taste for distinguishing the true and good from the false and bad.

Education must further inculcate an appreciation of principles. Many a person flounders about because he has never formed the habit of discovering the principle which underlies the situation which confronts him. To the baby, as Professor James says, the first experiences are "a big, blooming, buzzing confusion." To some persons they continue to be that all the life long! Such persons are helpless in the presence of even petty difficulties. The truly educated person no longer stares at things in a mass. He seizes the significant aspect or principle and solves his problem, whether mental or moral, with comparative ease. Such an education is always power.

Naturally all these attainments will be of very little worth if there has not been the formation of a well-fashioned will. It is not what one sees that counts, but what he does with what he sees. An institution, then, to set itself for the making of life must work to produce a nobleness of intention—a persistent ground-swell of the whole personality toward large ideals and magnanimous aims. It is not possible to improve on Kant's splendid sentence: "There is nothing in the world, or even out of it, which is absolutely good, except a good will." According to some theories of education, I might stop here. Such theories hold that education has nothing to do with a person's attitude toward the Infinite Person from whom we have come. I do not hold that theory. I believe, on the contrary, that a person's life is incomplete, truncated, unfinished, unless he knows by first-hand experience what it means to be religious. Helen Keller, blind and deaf, has learned much about our world of sights and sounds, of color and music. But she lacks one single experience of what it really means to see a sunset or to hear a human voice, and she is forever poorer for this lack. He who has no top window open to the heavens, who goes through life ignorant of what it means actually to feel the everlasting arms of God underneath has missed something for which there is no substitute. If he has learned to play foot ball and to scan Greek poetry, and yet has not learned to find in this world any Infinite Companion to enjoy and to pray to, we cannot say that he has succeeded in making a life. Religion is not something added on to a life as an ornament. It can no more be put on than perfume on a flower. Religion is the life itself, the true and consummate flowering of the personal life. It is the growing of a soul. Religion is as much a fact of life as the law of gravitation is, or as the conservation of energy is, and it must not be left out of an institution which undertakes to make lives. Shall we study clay tables and fossils in rock, shall we devote time and thought to the wars of Julius Cæsar and the conquest of the Normans, and neglect the things which have influenced the world immeasurably more—namely, the divine message which has come through Hebrew prophets and the revelation of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ? Schools and colleges will not and should not take the place of the Church, but they must take their place by the side of the Church in advancing the kingdom of God and in making His knowledge cover the earth as the waters do the sea! The Bible has been well-nigh banished from our public schools; it is hardly taught at all in most homes; it is studied in tiny chunks for a half hour each week in the Sunday School, and under these conditions it is no wonder that we discover, as we do everywhere, a woeful ignorance of the Book which, more than any other one influence, has given the Anglo-Saxon race its world supremacy. If we are to keep the high quality of righteousness and the love of truth and the sense of God which have characterized the best men of this race and given them the leadership, we must teach this Book to our youths and we must teach it to them so that they will care for it and appreciate its matchless power and sublimity. We do not want critical, dry-as-dust analysis of its pages, but illuminative teaching, so that it will become in reality, and not merely in name, a revelation of God. The great changes which the scientific method of study have forced upon thinking people in the last quarter of a century make it of the first importance now that the Bible should be taught to students by men who see and hold fast to the permanent truth, which remains immovable in the midst of the change, like the rainbow over Niagara, that stays, regardless of the change of water. The person who thinks, never stops satisfied with two kinds of truth. He wants to see things reconciled, and his teachers must show the young man, and the young woman, too, how the truth which has come through holy men under the inspiration of God fits with and completes all that can be learned through the telescope and microscope, through physiology and psychology and the long list of other ologies which weary the flesh.

But once more I say, the value of an education is to be measured not by the number of the facts learned but by the actual power which is imparted to the life—the dynamic quality of it. Does any man want to make his life count, then he must take pains to learn how this complex, modern society of ours can be changed, can be affected. A person may be very ignorant, and yet have a very pure and lofty spiritual experience; but if he hopes to influence men very widely, he must train himself for his task. Does any one suppose you can make over human society without a knowledge of its elements and its laws and with no comprehension of its long history? There must be noble consecration, but with it there must also be clear insight and solid experience.

There are whole masses of human beings in our cities who are as ignorant of the true God as are the pagans who bow down to stone idols. There are hosts of working men who have lost all faith in the churches. There are homes of wealth near all our great cities in which the actual influence of religion is almost nothing at all. There is a great wave of materialism sweeping through all ranks of society. Some of our daily newspapers are as coarse and vulgar and depraved as though we had never outgrown the Roman Empire. What a field of service there is! Little you can do if you are a mere nominal, formal, traditional Christian, looking for the world to take care of you and give you an easy, comfortable passage through it. Much you can do if you make your life an organ for the Infinite Life of God to express itself through. The dead will again be raised, and a new social life will begin to pulsate about you. The first real step a man takes in this world is when he solemnly resolves to be absolutely genuine, as though he knew that the eyes of God saw through him every minute, and to make himself an efficient instrument for God.

The Quaker has always treated education as a precious thing, but never as an end in itself. You may almost as well deck yourself in jewelry and fine linen for show as to put on an education for no other purpose than to show that you are educated. Education is a power; it is something dynamic, and if you possess it it puts you under tremendous obligations. You are to turn it into life-stuff. An ideal is no good unless it makes a man do something. "What are those silver statues standing there?" shouted Cromwell, as he saw the twelve apostles carved in silver in one of the cathedrals. "They are saints," answered the timid verger. "Well, what are they doing there? Melt them up and make them of some use to the State!" I would do just that with every Friend. I would not exactly melt him, but I would make him white hot and put him to some use in the State and the nation.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

The two hundred and seventh session of North Carolina Yearly Meeting convened at High Point, N. C., Eighth month 3d, with L. L. Hobbs, president of Guilford College, as clerk. He was reappointed clerk for the ensuing year.

The permanent board convened the day before, with Joseph Potts as clerk. He had previously requested to be released, from the clerkship of the board, and F. S. Blair was appointed to fill the vacancy. Other sessions of this board were held, but no business of general interest was transacted.

The ministers in attendance from other yearly meetings with credentials were Samuel L. Hayworth, of Wilmington Yearly Meeting; Zenas L. Martin, of Iowa Yearly Meeting, missionary in Cuba, and Lydia N. Pearson, of Indiana Yearly Meeting. Prof. C. W. Hodgkin, of Earlham College, an elder, with credentials from his friends, and from the Peace Association of Friends in America, was present in response to the invitation of the Peace Committee of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

On the 4th inst. Robert W. Douglas, of Ohio, Indiana Yearly Meeting, came in and was gladly greeted.

A very interesting report on the state of the Church was received from the various quarters. This report, under the provisions of the Uniform Discipline, takes a more varied and comprehensive range, and seeks to show the spiritual condition and working forces of the Church. It also gives the numerical strength and educational statistics. Notwithstanding a separation in one monthly meeting the membership of the yearly meeting is now larger than it was last year.

The evangelistic and church extension report was presented by Mary C. Woody, superintendent of the work. It was quite full, yet it held the constant attention of the meeting and was followed with increasing interest.

The fewness of our ministers is deplored. "They are totally inadequate to the demands upon them," says the report. Twelve thousand dollars in buildings and improvements have been made the past year. The report urged taking up the work in the towns and cities where so many of our members are going, and which offer opportunities for sowing good seed and reaping rich harvests.

The committee recommended the appropriation of $500 for its use in furthering the work. A subscription of $559.39 was taken in the meeting, and later the finance committee appropriated $500. It may be said that the time of rejoicing and the culmination of interest was reached in the consideration of this subject.

The Bible School work, as presented by Jabez R. Mendenhall, general superintendent, showed slackness and indifference in reporting the work promptly. The statistics were not ready for the meeting, but will be prepared and put into the published minutes. At the recommendation of the superintendent a committee was appointed to arrange for Bible Institutes for the better training and equipment of Bible School and other Christian workers. Prof. Cyrus W. Hodgkin spoke briefly about the Bible and the study of it. On First-day, at 9 o'clock, Dr. C. C. Hubbard, member of the yearly meeting, lead an interesting round table exercise on the qualifications and duties of the Bible School Superintendent, which was followed by a brief talk from Prof. C. W. Hodgkin. The amount of time given to the consideration of the Bible School, and the interest awakened therefor, augured well for the work next year. J. R. Mendenhall was continued as superintendent, with an appropriation.

The peace committee's report was presented by its chairman, F. S. Blair. It showed more work done than ever before in distributing literature, lecturing to colleges and schools of various grades, and securing money from individual voluntary contributions. A committee, with the same chairman, was appointed to continue the work.

Prof. C. W. Hodgkin gave a clear and logical address on "Peace and War." He showed that the Bible, science, history, patriotism, each and all, prove conclusively that war is wrong and that the nation which takes the sword will perish with the sword. Royal J. Davis, who has lately become a member of the yearly meeting, spoke on behalf of the Peace Association, and was made a member of the peace committee. The yearly meeting could not see its way clear to make an appropriation for the Peace Association of Friends in America, and only set aside $5 for the use of the peace committee.

The report from Blue Ridge Mission and Augusta Academy was presented by D. E. Sampson, superintendent. Both stations are in excellent condition. The work is continued under the care of a committee with the same superintendent. Sallie C. Marshburn has charge of the home at the mission, and Sibyl Stanley and Hannah Rakestraw, of Michigan, are to have charge of the school for the ensuing year. Jasper Thompson and Margaret Hackney are employed for the school and home at Augusta Academy.

The committee on the suppression of the liquor traffic did active work during the year in laboring to carry out the Watt's law, which prohibits all distilleries and saloons in the State outside of incorporated towns and cities. Within these the manufacture and sale of liquor may be prohibited by a vote of the people. William Bradshaw, a Baptist minister of Wilkesboro, N. C., delivered an enthusiastic address on the subject of temperance before a large and appreciative audience.

The orphanage farm was reported in better condition than ever before, yielding about 500 bushels of wheat and 400 bushels of potatoes, with a fine prospect for a large crop of corn. A six month's term of school was very successful. The report of the committee to confer with the managing board of the orphanage expressed satisfaction and surprise that so much could be so well done with so little money, and commended the institution to the earnest care and liberality of Friends. The work was continued in care of the same committee.

The report of the general committee on education showed care and attention to the subject in all localities. Very few of the children of Friends were out of school the past year. The members are active and effective in securing local taxation for longer terms in the public schools, for the organization of graded schools, and for better teaching.

Guilford College made great progress during the year. An electric lighting and water supply system was completed. The entire indebtedness of the college was paid. The current expenses were more than met by the receipts for the year. The total enrollment was greater than ever before in the college. Allen Jay's invaluable services, and the efforts of President Hobbs in securing money to pay all claims against the college were gratefully acknowledged.

President Isaac Sharpless of Haverford College, closed the consideration of the educational work by remarks clear, strong and well suited to the occasion. Later, at 8 o'clock in the evening, he spoke at length on the subject of education, holding the interest and attention of the audience from beginning to end.

Foreign mission work, the Christian Endeavor and the committee on Indian and negro work received the usual attention and encouragement. The committee on the Industrial Mission in Africa was merged with that of the Foreign Mission work.

The epistles from the various yearly meetings were read, except those from New York and Oregon, which did not arrive in time. Returning minutes were granted to all who brought credentials to the meeting.

One visiting minister spoke of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, though small in numerical strength, as the mother and grandmother of Friends and yearly meetings westward to the Pacific Ocean; and some of the children and grandchildren are coming back to help their mother keep house and till the fields that have been neglected, that they may yield abundant fruitage for the Master's use. We have permanently with us within our borders Edgar Williams and Eli Reece, both earnest ministers. Also Raymond Binford, Royal J. Davis and Louisa Osborne, who are teachers in Guilford. In addition to these Zenas L. Martin and Lydia Newby Pearson are doing good service in the meeting for a season. All of these were born in North Carolina, or are the descendants of North Carolinians.

The morning meetings in the tent in the grove, and the meeting for worship on Fourth-day evening, were times of real uplift and blessing to many. The meetings on First-day in the meeting house and tent were crowded, and the multitudes heard the gospel in them both forenoon and afternoon. Near the close of the meeting an excellent memorial of Dr. Joseph J. Cox, deceased, was read, awakening tenderest feelings because the subject was so beloved throughout the yearly meeting. Under a deep sense of solemn gladness and divine overshadowing the meeting closed to meet next year at Guilford College, if the Lord permit.

THE BIBLE INSTITUTE OF INDIANA, WESTERN AND WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETINGS.

[We have received two short accounts of the Bible Institute held at Earlham College. They are both valuable, and will be read with interest.—ED.]

The eighth Bible Institute was held at Earlham College, Seventh month 26th to Eighth month 3d, 1904. The attendance was about that of previous years, but was more nearly representative of the membership of the yearly meetings participating. Those in attendance had a deep sense of the needs of the times and were eager for any instruction that would help solve the problems before them. The general feeling was that this Institute marked a distinct advance. The outlook was broad and hopeful, and the spirit of the Institute was scholarly and aggressive.

The program was very comprehensive. The life and times of Jesus Christ were presented in an extensive series of lectures by Prof. Shailer Mathews, of Chicago University, and Elbert Russell. Prof. Graham Taylor, of Chicago Theological Seminary, and Thomas Newlin, of Guilford College, gave an impressive series of lectures on the social meanings of Christianity and the social duties of the Church.

Especially noteworthy was the series of lectures and conferences looking toward a better, a more thoroughly organized and unified Quakerism in these yearly meetings. Religious education, the improvement of the Bible Schools, the adaptation of the pastoral system of our constitution and principles, and the publication and dissemination of distinctively Quaker literature were discussed by Ira Landrith, secretary of the Religious Education Association; President Robert L. Kelley, of Earlham College; Allen Jay; Robert Pretlow; President Albert J. Brown, of Wilmington College, and Elbert Russell. A scholarly series of lectures on principles of pedagogy for Bible School-teachers was given by Professor Irving King, of Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The morning and evening meetings for worship were occasions of spiritual uplift, and, together with the Bible talks by Dr. R. A. Walton, an evangelist of the Presbyterian Church, contributed very much to the deepening of the spiritual life of those present.

The Institute seeks to extend the sphere of its influence by reading courses that have been in successful operation for two years, and which it planned to make more extensive and efficient for the future.

The Friends' Bible Institute of Indiana, Western and Wilmington Yearly Meetings, has just closed one of its most interesting and successful courses of instruction.

There was a pervading atmosphere of good will, a deep, strong, tender current of Christian fellowship everywhere.

It means much to the future of our several yearly meetings for their young people to become acquainted and mingle together socially, for common interests to touch, and plans of church work to be discussed.

The meetings for worship, held at the opening of every morning session, and the Christian Endeavor prayer meeting, held every evening, gave life and power to the Institute.

The coming of the Educational Conference, to be held at Earlham College next summer, was discussed and a committee appointed to co-operate with the committee of arrangements.

The extension work of the Institute was more thoroughly organized, plans to procure books were discussed and arrangements made for the graduating exercises of those finishing their two years' course of study to take an hour on the program.

The home workers represented the three yearly meetings and did faithful service throughout the week.

Professor Shailer Mathews and Ira Landrith, from Chicago, were especially appreciated, but the burning message of the hour was delivered by Graham Taylor. A cry to the Church from out the stress and strain, the wrong and suffering of the Chicago strike, while the last lecture, "The Paradox of Christianity," by Elbert Russell, was its concluding note. "He that loseth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

The Institute closed under a solemn sense of our duty to the Christ and to the suffering, sinning world He died to save. On behalf of the Institute, ELIZA DOANE MENDENHALL.

ELIZABETH T. LARKIN.

The recent death, at Salem, Mass., of our beloved Friend, Elizabeth T. Larkin, seems to demand more than a passing notice.

She was born in Byfield, Mass., in 1835, and when nineteen years of age united with the Congregational Church at that place. She graduated from the State Normal School at Salem in 1857, and immediately entered upon her work as a teacher, which vocation she followed for more than twenty years. Possessed of a strong, vigorous and cultivated mind and of a deeply-religious nature, her influence for good over her pupils was very marked.

Failing health forced her, much against her inclinations, to relinquish teaching and to seek rest and health in the country.

As she delighted to acknowledge in later life, her Heavenly Father led her into a family of Friends. Their ways and their meeting, which she attended, became very attractive to her, and led her to study very closely the scriptural foundation upon which the Friends' special doctrines and beliefs rested.

To her surprise, as she studied, she found herself obliged to assent to the correctness of these new views, and it was not very long before the conviction came to her that it was her duty to unite with Friends.

This, however, introduced her to the severest struggle of her life. All her early training, her family associations, her church connections combined to influence her against a step which seemed likely to antagonize all these. But, as she waited upon the Lord, she was enabled to yield obedience to the divine will.

From the time that the surrender was made to the close of her useful life not a shadow of doubt as to her having been rightly led ever seems to have crossed her mind.

Soon after uniting with Friends her gift in the ministry was recognized and acknowledged, and from this time forward her whole life was devoted to the church of her choice. Both her voice and her pen were consecrated to the Master's service. Her ministry was lively and convincing. She was a ready writer, and many a weary, discouraged toiler was cheered and encouraged by a letter evidently born of the Spirit, but written by her. She traveled quite extensively within the limits of New England Yearly Meeting, and as she went from one home to another she was peculiarly favored to enter into sympathy with both old and young, and to speak to all the "word in season."

She was well adapted to personal work, and was very faithful in this respect. She was also an active worker in the W. C. T. U., as in all other movements for the uplifting of humanity.

Though she has passed from our sight yet her memory is precious, and the seed she was favored to sow is even now bringing forth fruit.

THIRD QUARTER.

LESSON IX.

EIGHTH MONTH 28, 1904.

ELIJAH DISCOURAGED.

1 Kings 19: 1-8.

GOLDEN TEXT.—In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me.—
Psa. 120: 1.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 22.—Elijah discouraged. 1 Kings 19: 1-8.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 23.—A despondent heart. Psa. 55: 1-8.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 24.—Cast down. Psa. 42.

Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 25.—Trust in God. Psa. 55.

Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 26.—God able to deliver. Rom. 8: 35-39.

Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 27.—Power to the faint. Isa. 40: 28-31.

First-day, Eighth mo. 28.—The godly delivered. Psa. 34: 7-22.

Time.—B.C. 870. Immediately following the last lesson.

Places.—Jezreel, the city, in the plain of the same name southeast of Carmel. Beersheba, in the southernmost part of Judah. Horeb, or Mt. Sinai, which are practically interchangeable names.

Rulers.—Ahab and Jezebel, king and queen of Israel; Jehoshaphat, king of Judah; Benhadad II., king of Syria, at Damascus.

There is no parallel account.

1. "And Ahab told Jezebel." She, for some reason, had remained at Jezreel. Doubtless she was surprised at the story.

2. "Sent a messenger to Elijah." This was a confession of her weakness, for had she dared to order Elijah to be put to death she would have done it without warning. "So let the gods." This is as a heathen would speak. Her object was to frighten him so that he would leave the country. "Thy life as one of them." That is, as one of the prophets of Baal whom thou caused to be slain. "By to-morrow about this time." She gave him twenty-four hours to live or to escape.

3. "And when he saw that." When Elijah recognized the purpose and hatred of Jezebel. "Want for his life." To save his life. Compare Gen. 19: 17; 2 Kings 8: 7. "To Beersheba." Half way between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. It was at the southern limit of cultivation. "Left his servant there." Probably because he wished to be alone.

4. "Went a day's journey into the wilderness." This was the wilderness or desert of Paran; the Israelites has traversed it on the way from Egypt. He desired absolute solitude. Was this flight of Elijah justifiable? The question is a difficult one to answer. Was it not strange that the man who had been so bold on Mt. Carmel should fly at the reception of the queen's threat? All that can be said is that it would seem that Elijah was sure in the one case what his duty was, and was bold as a lion; in the other he may have had no light, and came to the conclusion that until he had further light he had better fly. "Juniper tree." Literally "a certain broom bush." "Requested that he might die." He was greatly disappointed. Jezebel still was in the ascendancy, the worship of Baal will be restored, and his work had amounted to little. "I am not better than my fathers." His strength is simply man's strength; he has reached the limit of endurance, and his life is only a burden. Compare Num. 11: 15; Jonah 4: 3, 8.

5. "And he lay down and slept." R. V. After such a period of strain, sleep was natural. "And behold an angel touched him." R. V. Angels are constantly described in the Bible as God's messengers, especially in the earlier books. "Arise and eat." Very likely Elijah had tasted but little food since leaving Jezreel.

6. "A cake baked on the coals." This probably means a flat cake baked, as was usual, on hot stones. A fire would be kindled on stones, then the hot ashes or embers would be raked away, and the dough was then placed on the stones, and sometimes covered with the hot ashes. "Cruse." An earthenware bottle. "Laid him down again." He was extremely weary.

7. "Because the journey is too great for thee." It would seem that Elijah had in the first instance gone into the wilderness as a matter of precaution to save himself from Jezebel, and that he had no definite plans. This would appear probable from the fact that he took no food with him. It was probably the angel who told him to make the journey to Sinai, though no record of such advice exists.

8. "Went in the strength of that meat." "Meat" is used in the broad sense of "food." It does not say that Elijah did not make use of the berries or roots that he might find in the desert, but the idea is that Elijah was divinely sustained. "Forty days and forty nights." A period several times named in the Bible. Moses had been forty days and forty nights on Mt. Sinai; Christ was forty days and forty nights in the wilderness; the Israelites were forty years wandering. "Horeb." This was the same as Sinai. It could have been easily reached by Elijah from Beersheba in eight days; what then does "went in the strength of that meat forty days" mean? Probably Elijah was wandering about part of the time, possibly meditating, doubtless spending a large portion of the time in prayer. The account does not say that the time was taken up in the journey. "The mount of God." Because there the law was given to Moses. It was the holiest place in the religious history of the Israelites. Elijah felt, doubtless, that where the national religious covenant had been formed was the best place to meet with the God who had given it forth. It is not at all unlikely that he may have felt that he could get nearer Jehovah there than elsewhere, and that there he could best "renew his faith by personal contact with the God he served."

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Even the best men and women are liable to attacks of depression.

2. Physical weakness, or physical need, is often the cause of spiritual depression, and even of spiritual wrongdoing.

3. The Christian should do what he can, and leave the rest to God.

4. "When obstacles and trials seem Like prison walls to be,

I do the little I can do,
And leave the rest to Thee."

NATIONAL MISSIONARY HEROES.

Heb. 11: 32-40.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 22.—Peter and John. Acts 4: 18-21.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 23.—Stephen. Acts 7: 54-60.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 24.—Philip. Acts 8: 1-18.

Fifth-day, Eighth mo. 25.—Paul. Acts 9: 22-30.

Sixth-day, Eighth mo. 26.—James. Acts 12: 1, 2.

Seventh-day, Eighth mo. 27.—In Nero's Palace. Phil. 4: 21-23.

The beginnings of mission work on this continent were probably made by the Catholics in Florida, and the same Church was pioneer in the extreme West and Southwest, where, around the old "missions," extensive establishments grew up and the arts of civilization were taught to thousands. In the Mississippi Valley and around the Great Lakes these missionaries went, some of them being the explorers of new regions as well as bearers of a new message. Too often mixed with policy and superstition, sometimes corrupt and opposing unscrupulously the work of Protestant missions, there was yet a heroism and devotion that proved the earnestness of these Romanist apostles, and we cannot doubt that much good was accomplished by them.

Thomas Mayhew, English governor of Martha's Vineyard in the year 1642, was himself one of the first to labor for the spiritual welfare of the dusky natives of New England, and was succeeded in his labors by his descendants to the fourth generation, covering a span of more than a century and a half. Contemporary with Mayhew lived and toiled John Eliot, "the apostle to the Indians," who translated the Bible into the Indian tongue and aided in the conversion of many.

To Indian missions Dartmouth College owes its origin, having been first a school for Indian youth at Lebanon, Conn. Among its pupils was Sampson Occum, who in four years learned the English language and began the study of Latin, Greek and Hebrew. Occum was sent to England to secure aid for the school, and obtained £10,000, with which sum the present college was founded.

Coming to a period covered by the lives of those yet living we find Marcus Whitman going to Oregon in 1836, accomplishing great good for the natives, largely instrumental in preventing the abandonment of the territory to the British in 1843, leading a body of one thousand settlers to the great new Northwest, and finally perishing, in 1847, at the hands of Indians, who were no doubt instigated to the deed by the hostile priests of the Catholic Church.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has had a standing committee on Indian work since 1795, other yearly meetings assuming like duties in their order, so that in the United States and Alaska much care and means have been expended by Friends, and the day is not yet here when the labors shall cease.

The work thus briefly glanced at has been carried on in the face of dangers and death, encountering opposition in many forms, the hardest of all to understand being that of the colonial governments. In New York, for instance, two Moravian missionaries were, in 1745, imprisoned for preaching to Indians.

The results of missionary effort have frequently been dissipated by the greed of the white man that drove settled Indians to seek new homes; yet the abiding effects have proved the adaptability of the gospel message to the needs of all men, and have shown afresh how God honors His children who enter into the spirit of His loving purpose.

Kansas has organized the greatest number of societies (20), also has the largest number of new members (320).

Ohio has the largest number of accessions to the Church from societies (67).

Western reports the largest number who give two cents per week for missions (203).

Indiana has the greatest number of tithe givers (112).

The number of societies reported is six less than one year ago, with 3,531 fewer members. There is also an apparent decrease in the amounts of money raised, but this may be accounted for by the failure of four yearly meeting unions to report any amounts raised.

Friends' Mission, Kotzebue, Alaska,
Seventh month 14th, 1904.

Our hearts have already been gladdened by the welcome cry of the natives, "The steamer speaks! Steamer speaks!" for so they term the whistle of the mail steamer, whose landing place is some miles distant from us, so far that while we cannot see the same, the sound of the whistling comes to us across the hills. Wife and I went out to the vessel in a native boat made of sea lion skins, and while we did not have the anticipated pleasure of welcoming new missionaries, my wife had the privilege of seeing another white woman, the first, save herself, that has been here for almost a year past. The weather is warm and beautiful, and while the snow still lies in shaded ravines near us, we are able to get radishes, lettuce and spinach from our little garden. Later we may have a mess or two of turnips, but our summer season is only a few weeks long and nothing but the above-mentioned vegetables will mature. The work among the natives is being blessed of the Lord. Rarely, indeed, is a meeting held without some Esquimos finding Jesus as their Saviour, and they usually remain true to the vows they make. At present our mission has a "good standing" membership of about 630, and I know of none of them that would in lives they lead bring discredit to any meeting in the United States, and what is still far more to Him whose name they are so anxious to bear.

It may astonish many to know that quite a number of natives have traveled a distance of three or four hundred miles in order to reach this mission and "find Jesus" this past month. Away over on the Kozukuk River that flows far to the east of us these people had heard from Kowak natives, about Jesus that could be found at the mission, so they made a portage from their river to the headwaters of Kowak and floated down its waters until they reach this point. Some of them said they were afraid to die without having Jesus in their heart. One old "medicine woman" told us she had burned her house, because she had made devil tricks in the house. Now with Jesus in her heart she wanted a new house, where she would not recall the old evil practices, because of environments, praying for an outpouring of His spirit upon all the Friends' meetings. We remain as ever, His friend and thine,

DANA AND OTHA THOMAS.

Correspondence.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Friends' Meeting at Boulder, Col., was organized in 1900. Its membership is not large. This is partly due to the fact that so few Friends have known of the advantages and possibilities of the place.

Boulder has about 10,000 inhabitants, with an altitude of 5,400 feet, located on the Colorado & Southern, Union Pacific, and Colorado Northwestern Railroads, eighty miles northwest of Denver. It lies at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, with their perpetual snows and white-capped peaks standing like sentinels to the westward. It overlooks the "Picturesque Boulder Valley" and Plains which contain many creeks, lakes and reservoirs, beside thousands of acres of the most lovely fruit, farm, hay and grazing lands, stretching out as far as the eye can reach toward the south, east and north.

The wish we have in writing this article is to help those of our people who may be in delicate health to find a suitable climate, where expert physicians and surgeons are available. We have in Boulder a number of noted sanitariums, hospitals and infirmaries. As a health resort Boulder perhaps cannot be surpassed, with its numerous sunny days, there being an average of about 325 clear days and only 40 cloudy days during the year. The average annual rainfall is 15½ inches. The coldest mean temperature for six years was in Second month, 32 degrees; the hottest mean temperature for six years being 73 degrees. The temperature in Boulder is generally 5 degrees warmer in winter, and cooler in summer than in Denver.

The air is very dry and electrical, making this an ideal place for the hundreds of persons coming here for lung, throat, catarrh and rheumatic troubles, and it often benefits stomach, kidney and nervous diseases.

There are many small fruit farms in and near Boulder, on which there is raised in great abundance and perfection strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, grapes, plums, prunes and apples, and for which the prices are good. Land is worth from $40.00 to $200.00 per acre. The soil and climate are fine for the raising of cereals, wheat making from 40 to 60 bushels per acre; potatoes from 160 to 320 bushels per acre. Sugar beets are raised extensively. Crop failures are unknown. Boulder, as well as many other cities near by, is steadily building, this furnishing many tradesmen in all lines of work, at from $3.00 to $6.00 per day. Board is from $3.00 to $5.00 per week.

Boulder is called "The Athens of Colorado," because of its many educational institutions of high grade. In addition to the many secondary educational institutions, the State University is located here. There are about 85 professors in the university and 90 teachers in the other schools.

The Colorado Chautauqua is also located in Boulder Park, thus giving us the opportunity for six weeks of listening to the very best talent of the world, and a chance of attending its summer school. This, as well as climate and mountain scenery is bringing hundreds of business men and their families, teachers, tourists and health seekers from all parts of the United States and world to this place to spend their vacations and enjoy themselves.

The city has electrical and natural gas lighting. Gas is also used for cooking and heating. There are a number of extensive coal mines here, coal averaging $3.00 per ton. The city and country have free mail delivery. There are many open and promising fields for all the Christian workers that the Lord may lead this way.

WM. P. S. CATTELL,

Pastor of the Boulder Meeting.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Noah C. McLean has been holding a series of meetings at Beaver Centre, Pa., and at Angola, N. Y.

George A. Barton acceptably attended Purchase Quarterly Meeting, which was held at Chappaqua, N. Y., on the 6th and 7th inst., and had good service therein.

Prof. Cyrus W. Hodgin delivered a number of lectures at different points in North Carolina, under the supervision of the Peace Association, after the close of the yearly meeting.

Those desiring board and lodging during the week of Western Yearly Meeting can be accommodated by addressing Rebecca Palmer, Plainfield, Ind.

Eusebia S. Couch has been appointed superintendent of Sterling Quarterly Meeting, Kan. All persons desiring information concerning the quarterly meeting should address her at Sterling, Kan., R. F. D., No. 4.

Wm. L. Pearson visited with friends in and about Philadelphia a few days recently. He attended Twelfth Street Meeting the morning of the 31st ult., and spoke to the edification of those present.

We deeply regret to report that Richard H. Thomas has continued to fail rather than the reverse. He will have the love and prayers of Friends everywhere.

Ellison R. Purdy has accepted an invitation to remain another year at Oskaloosa, where his labors have been highly satisfactory. Several new members have been received during the past year since he has been serving in the meeting.

Refus M. Jones gave an address on "The Importance of Bible Study in the Home, in Our Schools and in the First-day School" at the Toronto Conference, held under the auspices of Race Street Friends.

Peace Jones, of South China, Maine, who has lived for 89 years in the house in which she was born, has gone to live with her niece at Webster, Maine, about forty miles from South China.

A. F. N. Hambleton, who has filled many places of honor and service in his own church, has been chosen president of State Sunday School Association of Iowa. He is a member of Oskaloosa Monthly Meeting.

The Board of Managers of the Biblical Institute for Kansas Yearly Meeting have changed their methods of institute work for this year. Instead of holding one general institute they are asking each quarterly meeting to hold an institute. This plan aims at bringing the benefits of institute work within the reach of a larger number of workers. It is to be hoped that the quarterly meetings will avail themselves of this opportunity, and arrange for a three-session program before yearly meeting time in Tenth month.

The sudden death (from lockjaw) of our friend, Eli G. Parker, will come as a shock to many readers. He has for many years been a faithful messenger of the good news at home and abroad. He had traveled extensively through the Eastern yearly meetings, and he had done valuable work through the Middle West—particularly in Iowa Yearly Meeting. At the time of his death he was living at La Mont, Mo. His wife, who has been a true helpmeet and fellow-laborer, is the daughter of Francis W. Thomas, of Indiana.

About four months ago a number of young Friends of Oskaloosa, Iowa, Meeting, organized a class for the study of the Uniform Constitution and Discipline, and regular weekly meetings have been held since. By this means considerable interest has been aroused in church affairs, and loyalty to our own denomination has been increased. Recently these young Friends invited the newly-appointed standing committees of the monthly meeting to hold a conference at the headquarters of the class, when nearly fifty Friends assembled and discussed in a social and informal way the needs of the different departments of church work. Each committee stated briefly its hopes and plans for the new year, and asked for suggestions from other Friends outside the committee. The occasion was considered very profitable, and the members of the class were gratified at the cordial response accorded to their invitation.

The Box Department of the Foreign Missionary Association of Philadelphia would remind Friends that the boxes for Tokyo, Japan, and Ramallah, Syria, will be closed the 31st inst. Some of the needs of the mission in Tokyo, including lists recently received, are as follows: Dolls (at least six inches long), games, boxes of stationery for the school girls, blotting pads, letter files, Ivory and Castile soap, Turkish wash cloths, thread, cottons, pins, needles and darning needles, furnished work bags, outing flannel, finishing braid, handkerchiefs for men and women, booklets, small gifts for the girls.

Some articles desirable for Ramallah are: Slates, pencils, sponges, stationery, lead pencils, kindergarten work, games, dolls, pictures, patchwork, needles, cottons, thimbles, bandana kerchiefs, gingham, muslin, outing flannel.

Very few of these articles and little money have been received. Many of the articles mentioned are not obtainable, or are both inferior and expensive in these countries.

The packages should be marked with the donor's name and the destination desired, and left at 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. It is a help also to have the gifts marked with their valuation for the customs duty and accident insurance. Gifts of money will be appreciated and acknowledged by the superintendent of the Box Department, Emily B. Stokes, 1719 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

We are just in receipt of seven new subscribers from Upland, Ind., with this encouraging letter:

"We are getting along real well in the work at this place. Our Sabbath School has more than doubled in the past five months. We are now building a new meeting house which will cost all complete about $4,500. It will seat about 400 persons. We expect to have it finished by about Tenth month 15th. This is a great field for Friends owing to the fact that Taylor University is located here, and many students come from all parts of the country. Many attended our meetings last spring. We are in the field here to stay, and propose by the help of the Lord to gather in our share of the grain. Already more than twenty-five have been added to the meeting. People are glad to accept real 'Friends' doctrine.'"

Thine, in His name, F. H. TORMOHLEN, Pastor.

A communication, dated the 28th ult., reads as follows: "The Training School for Christian Workers, Los Angeles, Cal., is in the fourth week of its mid-summer session, with an enrollment of twenty-five, and expecting thirty to fifty others from Chicago Eighth month 12th, with Horace W. Houlding, director of the South Chih-li Mission in North China. Matilda W. Atkinson, from Augusta, Maine, is the newly-elected principal, and is expected daily to arrive and enter upon her work. The school now occupies its new and commodious home of fifty-five rooms within two blocks of Friends' Meeting in Los Angeles, and will be a pleasant and convenient stopping-place for Friends who are in the city for a few days. Some of its former students are in India, China, Philippines, Guatemala, etc. Its course of study is chiefly Biblical, looking to the deepening of the spiritual life of its students. Among its directors are John Henry Douglas, Harry R. Keates, Lindley A. Wells, B. F. Farquhar, Eva Watson and I. H. Cammack."

MARRIED.

A LIMIT

One Thing Food Can't Do.

Food can't exactly paint a picture, but proper food to restore the daily wear and tear on brain and nerves as well as body can help. A successful artist says:

"I had been troubled with dyspepsia for 25 years, and my system was so run down I was so weak and miserable life was a burden to me until I made a great discovery about food.

"I am an artist by profession, and at that time was painting a large marine piece, but being in such poor health I could not do justice to it, and no matter how often I changed it there seemed always something wrong. Success lay just out of my reach because I did not have strength and vigor of brain as well as bodily strength to accomplish what I knew lay within me.

"Looking around me for help I decided to try a food I had heard so much about, and that was the way I was led to use Grape-Nuts; and it came at the right time. I had hardly given it a fair trial before I began to feel so much better, my dyspepsia disappeared, and I commenced to feel stronger and more vigorous all over, head and all, and it was not long before I was back at my work again with renewed energy and interest.

"Even more substantial proof of the help I got from this food was when I finished my painting and put it up for exhibition. Critics said it was a masterpiece, and I sold it a short time ago at a very good price. Before closing I want to mention the fact that my mother, in her 85th year, keeps strong and in fine spirits on her Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

France has been made to mourn the loss of ex-Premier Waldeck-Rousseau, who passed away the 10th instant.

An heir to the Russian throne was born to the Czar on the 12th instant. The occasion was a time of rejoicing throughout the country.

Brains seem easier to furnish than brawn at the United States Naval Academy. At the recent entrance examinations at Annapolis, 199 young men passed the mental tests, but of that number 114 were rejected as physically unfit.

The report of the government board on wireless telegraphy not only advises direct government control, through the navy department, of all coastwise apparatus as a means of military defense, but it declares that all private stations in the interior of the country should be controlled by the government through the department of commerce and labor. President Roosevelt has approved the board's recommendations.

The Sultan of Turkey has finally promised to make terms with the United States relative to a new treaty defining the rights of our citizens in that country. The Americans are asking for the right to build and teach schools, and for that purpose to acquire real estate and take other necessary measures. Turkey affords these rights to other countries, and there is no reason why the United States should not enjoy the same.

The people whose business it is to watch the course of summer travel say that never in the history of the woods has such a large number of people gone into the Adirondacks as during the present summer. Not only are they going for sport and health, but to enjoy the beauty of the woods. In this way New York will get a dividend on the money that has been spent in saving the forest and its wild life, an investment that is always good.

England's position as to the sinking of the neutral steamer Knight Commander seems entirely reasonable. If a belligerent cannot safely take the time or expend the fuel necessary to send the prize to a port for trial, it would be better to sink or burn outright that portion of the cargo deemed contraband of war than to sink the neutral vessel, which itself could not be considered contraband. The question raised at this point is the most difficult one of the lot precipitated by the operations of the Russian cruisers, since the Russian view has some plausibility when considered in certain relations. But, on the whole, the British government seems justified in taking a firm position against sinking the neutral ship under any circumstances.

The first telegraphic message ever sent from Nome, Alaska, to the United States was received by General Greely, of the Government Signal Service at Seattle, Wash., last week. It inaugurated the opening of the government wireless line from Nome to St. Michaels, a distance of 107 miles. From St. Michaels the dispatch passed over the wire line up the Yukon to Dawson and then to Seattle, the entire distance being 3,500 miles.

The salmon run in the Columbia River is exceedingly heavy, the packing houses having all they can do to keep even with the catch. The first night of the run some of the gill nets took as many as two tons of salmon each, and most of the boats averaged a ton apiece. So great was the catch that the packers were forced to put down their prices, and a further reduction may follow if the run continues.

What threatens to be a bitter and perhaps a prolonged fight between capital and labor began in New York last week when between thirty and forty thousand men were locked out by the Building Trades Employers' Association. This was a retaliatory move in return for the alleged breaches of agreement on the part of the Building Trades Alliance, which of late has been sanctioning strikes that have greatly embarrassed building operations throughout the city, as well as work on the new subway. The employees say that the arbitration agreement which has been enforced has operated uniformly in favor of the employers. Carpenters, painters, plumbers, masons and men employed in kindred lines of construction are all involved in this lockout, and unless peace-making agencies intervene, the situation will be grievous.

A year ago Governor Taft appointed a commission to investigate the opium question in Oriental lands with a view to future legislation for the Philippine Islands. The committee consisted of Bishop Brent, of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Dr. Albert, a Filipino physician, and Major Carter, president of the Board of Health of the islands. The commission visited China, Japan, Burma, Java and some of the Malay States. The committee in its report just issued recommends that opium should be made a government monopoly, not as a permanency, but with the purpose of complete prohibition of imports at the end of three years. Medical requirements are then to be provided for from the government stores, and only those confirmed users of the drug who are over twenty-one are to be granted a smoker's license. This is a drastic treatment of the subject, and will arouse much opposition.

Kuropatkin has made good his escape from the trap which the Japanese armies made for him and has thus avoided a decisive battle for the time being. On the 10th instant the Russian fleet at Port Arthur tried to escape Togo's vigilance and join the Vladivostock squadron. The attempt resulted in failure. After a short action the fleet was scattered. On the 14th the Japanese fleet, under Vice-Admiral Kamimura, encountered the Vladivostock fleet in the Strait of Korea and won a complete victory. The Russian cruiser Rurik was sunk and the cruisers Rossia and Gromoboi sustained serious damage.

JUST ONE DAY.

Free from the Slugger Brought Out a Fact.

"During the time I was a coffee drinker," says an Iowa woman, "I was nervous, had spells with my heart, smothering spells, headache, stomach trouble, liver and kidney trouble. I did not know for years what made me have those spells. I would frequently sink away as though my last hour had come.

"For 27 years I suffered thus, and used bottles of medicine enough to set up a drug store—capsules and pills and everything I heard of. Spent lots of money, but I was sick nearly all the time. Sometimes I was so nervous I could not hold a plate in my hands; and other times I thought I would surely die sitting at the table.

"This went on until about two years ago when one day I did not use any coffee, and I noticed I was not so nervous and told my husband about it. He had been telling me that it might be the coffee, but I said 'No, I have been drinking coffee all my life and it cannot be.' But after this I thought I would try and do without it and drink hot water. I did this for several days, but got tired of the hot water, and went to drinking coffee, and as soon as I began coffee again I was nervous again. This proved that it was the coffee that caused my troubles.

"We had tried Postum, but had not made it right and did not like it, but now I decided to give it another trial, so I read the directions on the package carefully, and made it after these directions, and it was simply delicious, so we quit coffee for good and the results are wonderful. Before, I could not sleep, but now I go to bed and sleep sound, am not a bit nervous now, but work hard and can walk miles. Nervous headaches are gone, my heart does not bother me any more like it did, and I don't have any of the smothering spells, and would you believe it? I am getting fat. We drink Postum now and nothing else, and even my husband's headaches have disappeared; we both sleep sound and healthy now, and that's a blessing." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SCENIC GLORIES OF THE LAND OF THE SKY AND SAPPHIRE COUNTRY.

Much has been written concerning the superb scenery of this unrivaled plateau; much more might still be written, and its glories would even then be far in advance of the most glowing description. From the moment the traveler enters this region until duty elsewhere forces him to leave it, naught that is unpleasant meets his eye. With a soil of unsurpassed fertility its verdure is of the deepest and most beautiful hue; its rolling hills enchantingly hem in its placid lakes, its broad rivers and its rippling streams, while its strikingly picturesque and lofty mountains—famed alike for their number and their size—form the background for innumerable scenes of natural beauty and grandeur. Any one of its massive peaks, placed elsewhere, would be an object of striking beauty. Here, surrounded by scores of others equally grand, its majesty is comparative.

The "glorious climate" of other places is often descanted upon by writers portraying the attractions of favorite resorts. That of Western North Carolina really deserves this appellation more truly than many much higher vaunted localities. At no season of the year is there ever the slightest discomfort, either from summer's heat or winter's chill. And for the reason that both of these features are entirely absent, summer is a season of "ethereal mildness"—winter a period of coolness and comfort, either pleasant and agreeable to invalid and full of attractiveness to the healthy and vigorous. The claims of perfection for the climate of this region are strong but they do not lack for the best and strongest corroboration. The official government records of the climate of Western North Carolina, which are unimpeachable evidence, give the following averages: Spring, 53.49 deg. F.; summer, 70.72 deg. F.; autumn, 53.48 deg. F.; winter, 38.87 deg. F.; with a mean for the whole year of 54.15 deg. F., and a mean relative humidity of but 65 per cent. The "Land of the Sky" and Sapphire Country is reached from Philadelphia in through Pullman Sleeping cars via Southern Railway. For descriptive matter regarding this charming country call on or address Charles L. Hopkins, District Passenger Agent, 828 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

RUSHING HIS FUNERAL.

As there was an old law against burying in the city of Albany, Bishop Doane says "Lippincott's," had a special act passed by the Legislature permitting his burial in the Cathedral.

What, then, was his consternation, and that of his friends when they read its text! It began in the usual form. The ending was something like this:

"We do grant that Bishop Doane be buried within the precincts of the Cathedral at Albany. This act to take effect immediately."

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. JESUS preached from a lily, and from a hand-ful of wheat, and from the stones of the temple, and from the vines, and from a coin. Lessons of faith and honor and purity and charity exhale with the morning dew. Every sunrise is the proem and every sunset the peroration of a noble discourse from God to His children. The man who feels with, and suffers with, and smiles with, Nature, to whom every flower and every grain of sand is a thought of God, and every leaf a note in a continuous coronation song, has an ever-increasing resource from which to draw as a wise lover and leader of souls. As Goethe says, "To such there came trooping up out of the meadows and singing down out of the skies thoughts like free children of God, crying out: 'Here we are! Here we are!'"

The revolution in Paraguay has reached such a state that the women, children and non-combatants have been compelled to leave the capital city, Asuncion.

The "Church Advocate," a paper published in Kansas, states that "out of the 105 counties in the State, 44 are without a pauper, and in 37 counties there is not a criminal case on the court docket, while in 25 counties there are not enough poor to even attempt the maintenance of a poorhouse. Is there any license State that can show such a record?"

The prevailing high prices for which wheat is now selling in this country is causing some interesting comment. One startling thing to be noted is the sudden conversion of the United States from the largest wheat exporting country in the world to one with so small a surplus that during the coming crop year it will probably be exceeded by Russia, India and Argentina, with Australia just behind. The "rust" has destroyed 75,000,000 bushels according to recent estimates, but this alone is not responsible for the change. The consumption of wheat by

AS EASY.

Needs Only a Little Thinking.

The food of childhood often decides whether one is to grow up well nourished and healthy or weak and sickly from improper food.

It's just as easy to be one as the other, provided we get a proper start.

A wise physician like the Denver doctor who knew about food, can accomplish wonders provided the patient is willing to help and will eat only proper food.

Speaking of this case the mother said her little four-year-old boy was suffering from a peculiar derangement of the stomach, liver and kidneys, and his feet became so swollen he couldn't take a step. "We called a doctor, who said at once we must be very careful as to his diet, as improper food was the only cause of his sickness. Sugar especially, he forbids."

"So the doctor made up a diet, and the principal food he prescribed was Grape-Nuts, and the boy, who was very fond of sweet things took the Grape-Nuts readily without adding any sugar. (Doctor explained that the sweet in Grape-Nuts is not at all like cane or beet sugar, but is the natural sweet of the grains.)"

"We saw big improvement inside a few days, and now Grape-Nuts are almost his only food, and he is once more a healthy, happy, rosy-cheeked youngster with every prospect to grow up into a strong healthy man." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The sweet in Grape-Nuts is the nature-sweet known as Post Sugar, not digested in the liver like ordinary sugar, but predigested. Feed the youngsters a handful of Grape-Nuts when nature demands sweet, and prompts them to call for sugar.

our own people has increased from 4.2 bushels per capita ten years ago to over 6 bushels per capita at the present time. This has been a great factor in reducing the amount of export.

Commander-in-Chief John C. Black, of the Grand Army of the Republic, stated in his annual address to the veterans at Boston, on the 17th inst., that the names of 47,373 new pensioners were placed on the roll during this year, and 49,156 were taken off. The cost of maintaining the pension system for the present year, he said, was $144,942,937; in 1903 the cost was $141,752,870. From this it appears that in the thirty-ninth year after the last gun was fired in the Civil War nearly 50,000 participants in it were added to the pension roll, and that notwithstanding there were two thousand pensioners less in 1904 than in 1903 the cost of the system increased $3,000,000. These are astonishing figures, and show that the further the war period recedes the greater grows the expenditures for pensions.

Czar Nicholas of Russia has issued a manifesto determining the order of succession to the throne. In the event of the Emperor dying before the Czarévitch attains his majority, the Emperor's brother, Grand Duke Michael, is to become regent, the Empress assuming the guardianship of the Czarévitch. He has also succeeded in appointing a Minister of Public Instruction. This appointment has been one which the Czar has found much difficulty in filling to his satisfaction, because of the friction growing out of the demands of the Jews and Poles to be admitted to the universities and the policy of the reactionary party to limit their number. M. Bozopeloff, the Minister of Public Instruction, was assassinated in Second month, 1901, by a student, and was succeeded by M. Vannowsky, who served but a year, and in turn was succeeded by M. Zenger, who proved himself to be so much in sympathy with the discontented classes that he was summarily dismissed on Second month last without explanation. His assistant, Lieutenant-General Glazoff, has now been promoted.

MISSIONARY BOX.

The Box Department of the Foreign Missionary Association of Philadelphia would remind Friends that the boxes for Tokyo, Japan, and Ramallah, Syria, will be closed the 31st inst. Some of the needs of the mission in Tokyo, including lists recently received, are as follows: Dolls (at least six inches long), games, boxes of stationery for the school girls, blotting pads, letter files, Ivory and Castile soap, Turkish wash cloths, thread, cottons, pins, needles and darning needles, furnished work bags, outing flannel, finishing braid, handkerchiefs for men and women, booklets, small gifts for the girls.

Some articles desirable for Ramallah are: Slates, pencils, sponges, stationery, lead pencils, kindergarten work, games, dolls, pictures, patchwork, needles, cottons, thimbles, bandana kerchiefs, gingham, muslin, outing flannel.

Very few of these articles and little money have been received. Many of the articles mentioned are not obtainable, or are both inferior and expensive in these countries.

The packages should be marked with the donor's name and the destination desired, and left at 20 South Twelfth St., Philadelphia. It is a help also to have the gifts marked with their valuation for the customs duty and accident insurance. THE HOME AS THE MAKER OF QUAKERISM.

THE true primary school is at the mother's knee. The teaching of this school remains for life. With it is inseparably associated the combined influences of the home. The teaching thus obtained enters into our being without our consciousness and is potent in the formation of our views of life and our character. Every normal child loves his parents, his brothers and sisters and his home.

We grow like that we love.

We grow like that we feed upon.

We are moulded by our environment.

Our pleasures determine our character.

We are speaking of Christian homes that are, or should be, sweet and pure and lovely. The foregoing propositions have a wide bearing upon all our being, but they are especially true in the formation and development of Christian life and character, and they have a peculiar application to that type of religious life and character which is called "Quakerism." It is one thing to profess Christianity, and it may be quite another thing to illustrate it in our lives. It is equally true of Quakerism, and we fear that herein is the great lack in our modern Quaker living. Children have keen perceptions. They may read the book of our lives and "know us like a book," before they read any book in their school series. No amount of profession and no earnestness of testimony, given either in or out of religious meetings, weighs with our children like what they know of the thought and practice of our daily life.

Is true Quakerism taught in our homes? It need never be referred to by name or by implication. It should be in the atmosphere. Its foundation thought is of an ever-present and loving Father. It excludes every thought of a God afar off. He is present at all times and in all places, to love us and help us and to do us good; to warn us from evil, to succor us in temptation, to show us the way we should go. He wants us to talk with Him; to tell Him of our joys and sorrows, our hopes and fears, and to commune with Him as the child communes with his mother when he lays his head upon her breast, though no word is spoken. The child wants no one between him and his parents, and he requires no one to be between him and his Heavenly Father. This is the crux of Quakerism, and he who lives in its atmosphere is a Quaker. Every true Quaker principle is logically deduced from it. Is this the atmosphere of our homes? Are our thoughts and actions moulded by it? Do our children know and understand this, as they know they are alive?

Of course many things follow in its train—truthfulness, courage, honor, trust and a love for all that is noble and right. Religious opportunities are a pleasure, religious duties are matters of course. To shirk these is disgraceful to ourselves and dishonoring to God.

Quaker character has an enviable reputation. It is founded upon the truth we have stated. It looks at realities and has no use for shams. There used to be a query in our Disciplines in reference to the training of children in "plainness of speech, behavior and apparel." The better query is, "Are Friends careful to train their children for solidity of character and soundness of judgment?"

The doctrine of Calvinism spread from Geneva to many countries, but their great impress upon the world's thought has come almost exclusively through Scotland, where earnest homes were saturated with it, and from these homes youth went out who remained steadfast and unmovable. When Quaker homes were saturated with its principles they, too, sent those who were strong in the faith and valiant for the truth. What is done in our homes to-day?

It must not be supposed that we say that every child from a true Quaker home will be all we might desire. Children have their individualities. One goes one way and one another.

*"From the same cradle's side—
From the same mother's knee—
One to long darkness and the frozen tide,
One to the Peaceful Sea."*

When a family lives in apparent devotion to the world for six days of the week and makes an effort to be devout on one; when the religious instruction of the children is turned over to the Sabbath School or to the ministry of public worship, and when religious life is only manifested on public occasions, we cannot expect to find children who are strong in the Lord and in the power of His might.

Blessed is that family whose God is the Lord!

UNDER THE JUNIPER TREE.

"What doest thou here, Elijah?" was the word which came to the prophet, sitting discouraged under the juniper tree. The prophet had a hard proposition to face. His people were drifting away from their faith. Destructive forces were at work wherever he looked. He himself seemed to be alone in the battle against the incoming corrupt "religion." He took the bad course, which we are all so apt to take. He sat down and counted up the difficulties—took account of his liabilities, as the business man would say. "There is that wicked Jezebel intrenched in the land. Everybody is afraid of her. Her priests have frightened away the priests of the Lord. All the power of the kingdom is on her side. I am all alone, and I am the last prop left to the cause of Jehovah, my God!"

But the most discouraging thing, after all, for the prophet is that God is doing nothing to save His cause. He has forces enough. Why doesn't He use them to destroy these enemies of His? There is His whirlwind, which tears up the mightiest tree as though it were a straw, and which even rends mountains. Mightier still for destruction is the earthquake, which cleaves open the solid earth, and which might be used to swallow up this whole host of idol-worshippers. Most dreadful of all God's forces is the fire of the sky—the lightning. How easy it would be to cleanse the whole earth of these corrupters with such forces as these, but God does not use one of them for this purpose. God does not come in wind, in earthquake or in fire.

"What art thou doing, Elijah?" Nothing. His despondency came from thinking of the difficulties and from wondering why God did not perform some overwhelming miracle. The best cure for such despondency is to get up and get to work. The man who goes to work in the line of his duty finds that the God who did not come in the great forces of nature—wind, earthquake, fire—does come in a quieter, and in less striking ways, as the power which speaks through the voice of a prophet, and which makes use of a feeble human instrument.

"What art thou doing?" is God's word to every despondent person to-day who is moaning over the dark outlook and the great castles of difficulty which lie there in front. This is the only cure for despair and pessimism and despondency—to do the next thing which needs doing straight before one's face. The doers of deeds are always hopeful and cheerful. Those who are girding themselves to do out their clear, plain duties, however petty and small they may seem, always see the sky reddening for a new dawn. The other lesson which Elijah learned is one for us, too, to learn, that, instead of using giant forces of nature in His spiritual work, God uses and must use human hands and feet and voices. His work is done by such slight things like us. He does not send irresistible forces to destroy sinners. He sends consecrated men and women to work among them and to bring the silent forces of light and truth and love and the divine Spirit to work upon them, until, lo! they are changed. Victories are not won under juniper trees, but rather by doing what needs to be done.

LUMINOUS HOURS.

BY JAMES E. C. SAWYER.

There are hours and moments in life that ever after are memorable. They are as distinct as a flash of lightning in the darkest midnight. John never forgot the very hour when he first met Jesus. In his old age he wrote: "It was about the tenth hour." Thus Dante remembers his first glimpse of Beatrice: "At that instant, I say truly that the spirit of life which dwelleth in the most secret chamber of my heart began to tremble with such violence that it appeared fearfully in the least pulses, and trembling said these words: Ecce deus fortior me, qui veniens dominabitur mihi."

Life's deeper meanings are revealed in many ways. Sometimes a sudden vision of the beautiful, the grand or the awful in nature gives a sense of enlargement to one's soul. The first visit to the Falls of Niagara, the first experience of a storm at sea, a view from the summit of a lofty mountain, a night on Mount Washington or the Rhigi Culm, the wonder of a perfect sunrise, the awfulness of a thunderstorm, the notes of the hermit thrush heard in the depths of the lonely wilderness, the whisper of the pines, or the manifold and mysterious music of the surges breaking on the shore in the darkness, creates an enhanced sense of the depths and possibilities of one's being. Often as one gazes at the glittering host of the stars, the whole firmament seems a fragment of the eternity that is hid in his heart. The poetic and spiritual suggestions of nature in hours when her deeper meanings are brought home to the heart haunt us as helpful memories ever after, and we cannot stoop to sin or folly without being rebuked by them.

The noblest literature teaches us in like manner. Its most inspiring influences come unexpectedly. There are moments in our reading that become eternal. The great books which we know best we know as a whole vaguely after all; and were we to commit them to memory our knowledge of them would in general still be vague; but there are particular scenes, characters, individual lines, which have suddenly created in us lofty and never-to-be-forgotten thoughts and imaginations. These episodes of our reading become a permanent part of our mental and spiritual environment. The influence of the holy Scriptures even is mainly that of certain scenes and passages that suddenly illumined or comforted us and have been a part of us ever since.

In like manner come to us the most beautiful and best influences of the human lives about us. Of the deeper nature of even our dearest friends we get fragmentary revelations, and their purity, truth, sympathy and unselfishness, though they may be constant qualities, come to our consciousness not in a general way, but in moments of transfiguration on their part or of unusual illumination on our own. Thus their virtues are connected in our thought with certain hours in their lives, or with particular memories of their looks or their expressions. We already knew them to be good and loving; but in a particular moment of great joy, or sudden anxiety, or deep sorrow, or divine quickening, they suddenly were manifested more fully than ever before. The daily life of the mass of our fellow human beings is neither beautiful nor heroic; and yet the divine side of human nature often shows itself suddenly in the motley multitude on the streets or the railway train. Splendid heroisms frequently startle us, and the divine deed of some obscure average man teaches us a loftier reverence for our kind. We see no angels; but how often we behold more than angelic beauty on the face of a child mysteriously smitten with some infirmity, or in the countenance of an old man whose whole life has been a struggle against many adversities.

More than a score of years ago a little girl sat, on a Sabbath afternoon, in a low rocking chair reading a book. One who was walking by her was arrested by an unearthly beauty of expression on the familiar face, always sweet and beautiful to him, but just then displaying something strange and wonderful, the like of which he had never seen before; there was a radiance in the face of his own child which struck him with awe and instantly stirred questions that he could not answer. Before morning his little girl was suffering from a malignant disease which terminated fatally in less than three days. Her face as he saw it that afternoon has always seemed a heavenly vision. That one memory is enough to assure him of the reality of glory.

The real world, the world of spiritual truth and beauty, is not remote from us. Glimpses of its brightness come to us in hours of toil and sorrow and strenuous victory over severe temptations. Its loveliness unexpectedly appears to us in the heavenly deed of a commonplace man or woman. Its splendor shines in the faces of innocent babes and transfigures the worn lineaments of the aged and the sick. The joy of its holiness, the sweetness of its content, the triumph of its unselfishness, are often seen in the lives and in the countenances of our fellow pilgrims.

New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth.—Lowell.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

MISSION LITERATURE AGAIN.

BY W. IRVING KELSEY.

An article appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, a short time ago, by May M. Jones, of the Cuban mission, emphasizing the need of more and better religious literature in the Spanish language. This called forth a communication from Henry H. Swift, who proposed as a remedy the teaching of the English language. Even if this were desirable, it would be a much larger problem than the one of supplying the needed literature in Spanish. We might as well try to supplant the German or French language. These linguistic problems must solve themselves or be solved by others; the missionary has a more important work on his hands. Nevertheless, English has a place in the curriculum of our schools, not only as an attractive part of the program in the lower grades, but as a great auxiliary to those who are preparing themselves for teaching and preaching. English occupies the place in our higher schools that German and French occupy in similar schools at home.

I want to second the appeal of the first writer. The publishing work of Friends in Spanish has never received the financial support which has been given to other departments of the work. As to the publishing house here in Victoria its only sources of income are receipts from subscriptions, sales of books and job work, with an occasional donation. As a result we are still publishing an eight-page monthly periodical ("El Ramo de Olivo"), although for a long time there has been a felt need that it should be enlarged and published semi-monthly. We also occasionally publish a booklet or tract, for which a special donation has been made. But as a usual thing our presses are idle.

Moreover, during the thirty-three years since the first Friends' mission was established in Mexico, men of experience and no mean literary ability have been developed. Two of our ministers are editors and among the leading producers of evangelical literature in Mexico. I refer to Eucario M. Sein and Luciano Mascorro. The former is editor of "El Catolico Convertido," and has his press in Matehuala, in the work of Western Yearly Meeting. The latter has been on the editorial staff of "El Ramo de Olivo" since 1876, and is at present not only available, but desirous of dedicating his whole time to literary work.

We have the presses and the men, and considerable material on hand which ought to be published. The only thing lacking is the money with which to do the work, for let it be understood that the publication of this kind of literature in Spanish is not a financially-paying business.

And this brings me to the main object of the present article. Having been in charge of our publishing work here in Victoria for the greater part of the past ten years, I have felt for a long time that the principal problem at the present time is to get the good literature already published into circulation. We need some system similar to that of the great Bible societies. They not only have their publishing houses in New York and London, but they have their agents, colporteurs and Bible depots in every country and almost every State. It is a distributing agency of this character which we need for Spanish evangelical literature.

There is no mean amount of such literature already published, and more is being produced continually. I will mention a few of the books of a more technical character such as are needed in our training schools. Some are translations and others have been written in Spanish. First of all there is a very complete Bible Concordance, a good Bible Dictionary and a Bible Manual, the three books with the Bible which Mr. Moody recommended to all his students. In church history there is Hurst's "Shorter History of the Christian Church," Backhouse and Tylor's "Early Church History," Fisher's "History of the Reformation," and D'aubigne's "History of the Reformation." In theology there is Paley's "Natural Theology," Mair's "Christian Evidences," Patton's "Summary of Christian Doctrine," "Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures" by the same author, Hodge's "Christian Theology," Alden's "Christian Evidences." In the line of commentaries there is Ryle's "Commentary on the Gospels," Pratt on Genesis, with Exodus ready for the press, and Greene's "Exposition of Job." Of works on introduction there is Miles' "Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures," Green's "Introduction to the Study of the Pentateuch," Borton's "Introduction to the Pauline Epistles." Then there is Sloan's "Pastoral Duties" and Stalker's "Lives of Christ and Paul."

As to Friends' literature, I have a copy of Barclay's "Apology" in Spanish, published in 1710. From our own presses have gone forth lives of Fox, Penn, Grellet and Elizabeth Fry, Gurney's "Essays on Christianity," Clark's "Instructions to Christian Converts" and "Offices of the Holy Spirit," "The Peacemakers of the New World," Barclay on the "Ministry" and on "Baptism," "Declaration of Faith and Discipline," besides a number of allied works of a more general character. Dymond's "Essays" have recently been published in Philadelphia.

In the above list I have confined myself almost entirely to works of a technical character, omitting controversial books, story books, and others of a general nature. Besides these there are tracts almost without number, and a great many evangelical periodicals, to say nothing of the rich mass of Spanish poetry and prose which has been accumulating during the centuries, and school text books of which there is now a good supply. But this is aside. We are treating of religious literature of the evangelical type.

Enough has been said to show that there is quite a supply of this kind of literature already published, but the fact remains that it is not in general circulation, not even the books which appeal to the average reader. Why is this? Not as a general thing on account of the cost, because most of them are sold at very low prices, and yet this is one reason. The Spanish Concordance costs $2.50 in gold in New York, and very few even of our ministers have been able to purchase it. Then when it comes to the buying of any number of works the cost is considerable, and our younger people especially are not able to meet it. Another reason for the small circulation is the difficulty in securing the works. They have been published by different publishing houses in the United States, Spain, Mexico and South America, and are not on sale in any one place. It would take considerable correspondence and several months to get the books together, which I have mentioned above, to say nothing of the difficulties in securing exchange. But even if all these works were put on sale in some centrally-located place, and the prices put down so that they would be within the reach of all, even to the extent of giving to worthy people who could not buy, even then the problem would not be solved. The literature must be made to circulate. Much could be done by advertising and through the mails. Missions could be used as depots and distributing centers, as is done by the Bible societies, but there would still be something lacking. A taste for this kind of literature must be developed and a knowledge of its existence brought home to the individual. In other words, sales must be solicited from door to door. Mission workers will reach a few, but they are too busy to do the work as it should be done. There should be special agents for this work corresponding to the colporteurs of the Bible societies.

But this would take considerable capital and time to develop. Until some such plan can be carried out I would suggest that each mission be supplied with funds with which to put in a good supply of books and tracts, and some one appointed whose exclusive work should be to see that this literature be offered for sale and distributed in all the stations of the mission. This person should be on the lookout for new publications and keep his stock up. Circulating libraries, such as are used in settlement work, could be established in each station, and used to advantage in cultivating a taste for this kind of reading, provided there is some one who will look after the books and see that they circulate.

To summarize, I would recommend that our publishing work be put on a firm financial basis, so that it can continue to produce good literature and increase the output. Secondly, that an agency be established similar to that of the Bible societies, the one object of which should be to circulate good literature, especially that of an evangelical type. Until this last can be accomplished, and in a way leading up to it, each mission should be supplied with a stock of good literature, and some one commissioned to foment its circulation in the territory of the mission.

C. Victoria, Tamaulipas, Mexico.

There is no life so humble that, if it be true and genuinely human and obedient to God, it may not hope to shed some of His light. There is no life so meager that the greatest and wisest of us can afford to despise it. We cannot know at what moment it may flash forth with the life of God.—Phillips Brooks.

Some Views on Present Topics.

QUAKERISM—RADICAL AND PERSISTENT.

BY W. P. PINKHAM.

First of all, Quakerism is radical; that is, it directs its efforts against the root of evil in the hearts of men. It is radical because it is Christian. The Gospel is pre-eminently radical. It does not deal directly with forms and appearances, but with origins and sources. The axe is laid at the root of the corrupt tree. Quakerism, because it is essentially and not merely nominally Christian, seeks not first to change men outwardly, but to change them inwardly—not to reform them, but to transform them. "Make clean the inside of the cup and platter, that the outside may be clean also." "Make the tree good, and its fruit good." "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit."

Quakerism seeks the realization of the new tree. The first note of its message to the awakened world is identical with the first response of Jesus to the inquiring Pharisee, "Ye must be born again." Church membership will not save you. A fine moral record will not save you. The commendation of your friends will not save you. "He calleth all men everywhere to repent." "Repent, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out."

This blessed experience of the forgiveness of sins was not to be assumed to have taken place merely because one had repented and believed, but was to be the subject of the clear testimony of the Spirit to the seeking soul. The transaction was with God; and the other party must hear from Him, and know that "the Spirit Himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God," before professing regeneration.

But Quakerism goes yet farther. It first seeks that men become branches of the true vine Christ Jesus through the new birth; but it also accepts the testimony of Jesus. "Every branch in me that beareth fruit He purgeth, that it may bring forth more fruit." Even for the branch—the living, fruit-bearing branch—there is a further work of cleansing. The faithful prophet must have the live coal applied to his lips, and be pronounced clean by the Divine Messenger. The witnessing church, though "ensamples to all them that believe," must yet be sanctified "wholly" and "be preserved blameless."

Nothing in Quakerism has been more offensive to a world-pleasing church than its insistence that through faith in the precious blood of Christ man may be cleansed from all sin, not only sin actual, but "sin inherent." Yet this was the burden of the Quaker message, as it is the burden of the Gospel.

Subsidiary to this was the doctrine that because Christ died for all men it is the right, the duty and the privilege of all men to come to God by Him, and to come directly, or without esteeming necessary the intervention of priest or ordinance. The bold appropriating and promulgating of this great fundamental truth of the gospel was and yet is offensive to many, as it strikes at the very root of ritualism.

Closely connected with the doctrine of universal redemption and the consequent right and duty of all men to seek deliverance from all sin at the hands of God, was the sublime doctrine that those who have thus sought and have received "the adoption of sons" are brethren, children of a common Father, and therefore eligible to His gifts and callings, regardless of social position, age, sex, education, or any merely human standard of fitness. Neither education nor ordination could make a man a minister. The power to labor in that sacred calling is a gift from Him who knows all men, and who divides "to every man severally as He will." Thus, again, the axe is laid at the root of priestcraft and ecclesiasticism, and the Church becomes a theocratic organization, sitting at the feet of her Lord, clothed with humility and awaiting His word, and then, with His message upon her lips, appealing to mankind in His name.

Quakerism insisted that "the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle toward all men." The Christian, therefore, must not take up arms against another under any pretext. He has enlisted under the Prince of Peace.

Quakerism insisted that a Christian's "yea" should be yea, and his "nay" nay. No oath could be better than that, and no government, religious or civil, had a right to compel men to swear. Let the government frown upon you; let the magistrate send you to prison or beat you with stripes, but "swear not at all."

But while Quakerism has been radical in its advocacy and defense of these great truths, and has by this fact been more or less distinguished from co-existent faiths, it has been just as radical in its support of those other truths which it holds in common with those faiths. It has believed and taught the divine origin and inspiration of the Bible and its authority as the divinely-appointed rule of faith and practice. While it has "never formulated a theory of inspiration," it has ever held that God, as distinct from man, can communicate His will to man, even as friend talketh with friend, and that holy men may receive messages from Him, not as products of their consciousness, but as manifestations of the divine Spirit, objectively, to that consciousness. True Quakerism never had divine inspiration mixed up with human intuition, genius, knowledge or sagacity. It recognized the value of these in their spheres, but inspiration had another sphere and a distinct Source as well.

Again, while Quakerism teaches that godly men may know, and should know, the voice of God in the soul, yet it also teaches that "whatsoever anyone says or does contrary to the Scriptures, though under profession of immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, must be reckoned and accounted a mere delusion." "There can be no appeal from them to any other authority whatsoever."

Quakerism, therefore, accepts the doctrine of the creation and fall of man as the Scriptures teach it; the doctrine of redemption by the blood of Christ, who "is the propitiation for our sins"; the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment;

the coming of the Son of man to judge the world. All this is comprehended in the message of Quakerism to the world. It has no message other than the Gospel, but this it has and with confidence proclaims. Least of all would it ever deny or fail to assert that the offering of Jesus Christ was substitutionary, propitiatory, expiatory and the only hope of human salvation.

Quakerism is persistent. It has come to stay. Those who have professed it have many times failed to practice, to inculcate, or even to accept some of its truths, but those truths cannot perish—not one of them. If the Friends fail to publish them or to live them, it is the worse for the Friends and for the world, but the truths will live on. What the Friends fail to maintain of their original testimony God will raise up others to maintain. Romanism and High-Churchism stood opposed to the broad catholicity and the divine simplicity of Quakerism, yet these are becoming more and more fixed in the heart of humanity. Legalism and worldliness have steadily opposed the doctrine of freedom from sin through sanctification of the Spirit. But when the Friends, who had been so richly blest in the promulgation of this, were driven or persuaded into silence, God raised up another branch of the Church to proclaim it more distinctly than ever; and when that Church had been blest beyond all precedent for its faithfulness, and was itself betrayed into an equivocal testimony upon a theme of such magnitude, then was born the mighty holiness movement of the present day.

And so, if every Friend should prove recreant to his trust, the truth which he should have promulgated another will be raised up to promulgate.

Most subtle and insidious of all the enemies of genuine Quakerism is the so-called "New Theology," a new mustering and grouping of heresies long since discarded by the Church of Christ, because contrary to the teachings of the Scriptures. In the name of Evolution it denies the fall of man; and in the name of Higher Criticism it denies the historicity of the early chapters of Genesis. It stands diametrically opposed to the doctrine of a substitutionary atonement, to a resurrection after physical death, to a personal return of our Lord, and to a collective judgment. It makes inspiration a product of the human consciousness, rather than a supernatural revelation to that consciousness. It sits in judgment upon the statements of Scripture, and accepts or rejects or modifies them at will. We are often told that it is old truth in a new garb, a statement that deceives no one who is well informed on the subject of Christian doctrine. Like modern Unitarianism and Universalism, it has very little in common with historic Christianity. It is essentially anti-scriptural. To accept it is to discard all that is vital in Quakerism, or so nearly all that what remains is ineffective for salvation. Friends may do this and lose their intended place as heralds of the gospel of salvation, or they may, as in early times, earnestly contend for the faith that was once delivered to the saints. Humanity was perhaps never more hungry than now for the gospel of salvation. It can be ministered to them with certainty and effectiveness from no other store-house than the Scriptures, nor in any other spirit than that of a reverent acceptance of the Scriptures as the ordained and infallible authority in matters of doctrine. Will Friends in this spirit "preach the word," and turn men from the power of Satan unto God, or will they be lured from their appointed path by the coming craftiness of men, and let others take their crown? Others will take it if Friends waver in their loyalty to the written word of God, for that word cannot fail, and through all defection and all apostasy will still be faithfully proclaimed to the end of the world.

Time.—870 B.C. Forty days after the last lesson.

Place.—Mount Sinai or Horeb, on the peninsula between the northern arms of the Red Sea. Horeb and Sinai are names used indiscriminately.

Rulers.—Ahab, king of Israel; Jehoshaphat, king of Judah; Benhadad II., king of Syria at Damascus.

There is no parallel account. The lesson follows immediately after the last.

9. "Thither." That is, to Horeb. "Unto a cave." The Hebrew has "the cave." Probably by the time Kings was written tradition had fixed upon some special cavern as the place of Elijah's abode. There is still a traditional cave shown. "The word of the Lord." A message from Jehovah. How it was delivered is not told, but it was probably in a vision. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" The primary meaning is doubtless, "Why art thou so cast down? How does it come about that thou art here in the wilderness? Is there not work for thee in Israel?" The question was full of reproof, and it is clear that Elijah so understood it.

10. "I have been very jealous for the Lord." Elijah's answer is explanatory, not boastful or complaining. He is grieved that any worship should supplant that of Jehovah. "For the children of Israel," etc. The implication is that it has been done willingly. "Thy covenant." See Ex. 20: 3. To forsake God's covenant is to forsake God. "Thrown down thy altars." This implies that there were a number of altars to Jehovah, as, for instance, the one on Mt. Carmel. "Slain thy prophets." See 1 Kings 18: 4. "I, even I, only am left." No one had stood with him on Mt. Carmel, not one of the hundred whom Obadiah had saved, not even Obadiah himself. Compare I Kings 18: 22. Elijah evidently thinks that the case was now hopeless, and nothing more was to be done.

11, 12. "And he said, Go forth." It is clear from verse 13 that Elijah did not go out of the cave until he recognized the presence of the Lord. The picture given in the following description is unmatched "in grandeur and depth of conception": "The Lord passed by arrayed in the terrors of storm, earthquake and fire; but none of these bring home to the prophet the immediate sense of God. It is only in the audible stillness which succeeds the fire that he feels the mysterious attraction of the Divine, and, wrapping his face in his mantle, comes forth to the entrance of the cave." "A great and strong wind." A hurricane. Such winds are not uncommon in the Sinai range. "The Lord was not in the wind." That is, the Lord was not the wind; it was a manifestation of the Lord's power, but not Jehovah Himself. "An earthquake." Nothing, it is said, is more terrifying than an earthquake, when the solid ground seems to fail. But even this is only a manifestation of divine power. "A fire." Probably lightning. Again this was not a token by which Jehovah would be known. "A still, small voice." The original is difficult to translate; it means literally, "A sound of gentle silence." There is nothing to indicate whether the sound was audible or not, but Elijah recognized the presence of Jehovah in some unquestionable way. Compare Job 4: 16.

13. "Wrapped his face in his mantle." He was sensible of the presence of Jehovah and that he should not attempt to look upon Him. Compare Gen. 32: 30; Ex. 3: 6; 33: 20. "Went out." It was now time to go forth. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" The question was repeated. Possibly twenty-four hours had elapsed since the first inquiry had been made. At any rate, there would be an added meaning since the wonderful exhibition which Elijah had seen. But the answer was the same, indicating either that Elijah was confused, or that he failed at first to grasp the teaching intended. In what follows Elijah is taught that the work of Jehovah is not dependent on any one man's work, however grand that may be; and that new agents will carry on the work even though Elijah may be laid aside.

15. "Return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus." Better, "by the wilderness to Damascus." He was to return through the wilderness by which he had come to Damascus. This was the capital of Syria, of which Benhadad was at present king. This route would take him through Ahab's dominions, but he would have a sense of the protection of Jehovah, who was sending him on a special mission. "When thou comest." To Damascus. "Hazeal." So far as Biblical accounts are concerned there is no record of Elijah's having anointed Hazeal. As he did not anoint Jehu, or Elisha, the expression is probably equivalent to point them out as the ones to be anointed, or appointed, to the offices. Hazeal was king of Syria (2 Kings 8: 13).

16. "Jehu the son." Really, the grandson. 2 Kings 9: 2. Son is used in the sense of descendant. "Elisha." The first mention of this great prophet. "Abel-meholah." This place was west of the Jordan, not far from Tirzah, and near Gilead. "Prophet in thy room." To be thy successor. Compare Matt. 2: 22.

17. "The sword of Hazeal." The account of the punishment which Israel received at the hands of Hazeal is given in 2 Kings 8: 28, 29; 10: 32, 33; 13: 3, etc. "Sword of Jehu." See 2 Kings 9: 24, 27, 33; 10: 1-7, 18-25. "Elisha slay." There is no record of any idolaters having been slain by Elisha. It may mean that he would be a mighty instrument against idolatry, and this he undoubtedly was.

18. "Seven thousand." Elijah has said he was the only one faithful to Jehovah. The answer was at once humbling and encouraging. Seven is here symbolical and probably indicates a still larger number. "Kisses him." The image of the false god. This was part of the worship. Compare Hos. 13: 2; also Psa. 2: 12.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. God's ways are not man's ways.
2. God takes care of His work.
3. God is more often revealed in the stillness and the quiet than in the storm.
4. God has more than one way of accomplishing His work, and more than one instrument.

Christian Endeavor

[Communications for this department should be addressed to Lindley D. Clark, 1429 New York Avenue, Washington, D.C.]

TOPIC FOR NINTH MONTH FOURTH.

NEW COURAGE FOR NEW WORK.

Ps. 144: 1-15; Acts 28: 15.

Second-day, Eighth mo. 29.—Strength from God. Gen. 49: 22-24.

Third-day, Eighth mo. 30.—Tarrying for it. Acts 1: 1-8.

Fourth-day, Eighth mo. 31.—New mercies daily. Lam. 3: 22-26.

Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 1.—David's resources. Ps. 23.

Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 2.—Isaiah's fountain. Isa. 57: 15, 16.

Seventh-day, Ninth mo. 3.—Paul's secret. 1 Cor. 15: 1-10.

The answer to the question, "What new work can we undertake?" will seem to many to be, "Nothing new, since we are hardly able to keep up in the old lines that we are all used to." Perhaps the very difficulties thus confessed are God's urgings to be on the lookout for other work and other modes of service.

Christ promises victory. His eye saw the yet unrealized downfall of Satan, and His most gracious bestowments are to those who are themselves overcomers. But our own neighborhoods show everywhere how much of the work that He meant His children to do remains as yet undone. If we are discouraged, we are not rightly assured of God's power. The mercies "new every morning" certainly include hope and confidence, for these are two chief pillars of the Christian life.

This hope and confidence are not in what we are or what we have done, but in the truth, so that we need not be over anxious about holding to our former modes of working or carrying out the plans that we have been accustomed to; but we may gladly undertake any new duty or earnestly seek for new solutions to our imperfectly-solved problems, sure that God will always honor the truth, and that our efforts in its behalf will not be "in vain in the Lord."

There is a spirit of compromise abroad that would lower the truth so nearly to the level of sinfulness that it may be approached by easy or almost unconscious gradations; but the popularity of evil practices is not proof that the Christian is to imitate them in order to win adherents to the cause of right. "What concord hath Christ with Belial?"

An institution that makes whiskey-drinking respectable will never supplant the saloon; nor will the giving of prizes and souvenirs at "progressive" card parties lead the young men and women who play for them away from the grosser and more exciting forms of gambling. It needs new courage to-day to stand against the specious pleas that are insistently made for the beer canteen and the model saloon and the social recreation with the element of chance and prize or stake, "to make it interesting." Yet if there is reality in the divine promises, there is abundant ground to stand upon in the battle for personal and social and political purity without denying ourselves except in the lower realms—mainly on the mere animal plane—while on the other hand the whole outworking of courageous obedience is toward an enlarging and the realization of a better self that finds its fellowship with God and its joy in a likeness to Him in whose image the new man is created, who in His service did always the things that were pleasing to God.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

George M. Hicks is now located in the meeting at Collins, N. Y.

New Providence Academy, Iowa, will open Ninth month 5th, with a strong corps of teachers. It plans for a prosperous year.

A communication from New Providence, Iowa, states that "the work of the church here is vigorous, encouraging and enlarging."

Willard O. Trueblood is now located as pastor in the meeting at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He and his wife are both graduates of Earlham College, Ind.

Minnie Bassett, who gave up her pastoral work at Carmel, Ind., early last spring, on account of illness, has recovered, and is now looking toward work. She hopes to attend several of the approaching yearly meetings.

Raisin Valley Seminary will open its fall term on Third-day, Ninth month 13th. A lively interest is manifested on the part of the Quarterly Meeting and others in the vicinity in behalf of the school.

James R. Jones, of Farmers' Institute Meeting, near Shade-land, Ind., has given some very interesting lectures at that place—two on Rome, one on "The Life and Times of George Fox," and one on "Temperance," all of which were enjoyed by those present. Seven have united with the meeting within the past year. He and his wife will remain another year as pastors in the meeting.

Friends' Meeting, in Richmond, Va., a city of about 100,000 inhabitants, is without a resident minister. They wish to correspond with some one who would like to settle there and labor with them. The Friends there have a large brick building, well located, with a small but interested membership. Any minister feeling drawn to this field of labor should write to James G. Whitlock, No. 5 North Eleventh Street, Richmond, Va.

Those who are expecting to attend the Iowa Yearly Meeting will be glad to know that a rate of one and one-third fare for round trip has been granted from all points in Iowa, Nebraska and Minnesota, on the certificate plan, where fare paid is more than 50 cents. Certificates showing full fare was paid must be obtained from starting station, and each station where change of roads are made, so certificates shall correspond with each ticket purchased in going. Tickets must be bought in going from Ninth month 3d to 8th, inclusive, and returning are good not later than the 16th.

Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting will be held at Arthursburg, N. Y., Ninth month 8th. The following program has been outlined: 10.00 a.m., meeting of ministry and oversight, Wm. H. Birdsall, clerk; 11.00 a.m., meeting for worship; 12.00 m., meeting for business, George H. Duell, clerk; reports of monthly meetings; report of Bible and Tract Committee; report of Temperance Committee; 2.00 p.m., quarterly meeting conference on various phases of the temperance question, John J. Haviland, chairman; paper, "Advance of Temperance as Seen in Disciplines of Friends," by Rhoda A. Swift; address, "The Trapper and His Traps," illustrated by Adirondack stories, objects and curios, by J. Lindley Spicer; 3.30 p.m., gospel service, to be led by Willard O. Trueblood, of Poughkeepsie.

Arrangements have been made with the Central Passenger Association for reduced rates for those wishing to attend Indiana Yearly Meeting, commencing Ninth month 28th, 1904. Tickets will be on sale Ninth month 26th, 27th, 28th, and Tenth month 1st, at the rate of one fare, plus 25 cents, for the round trip (the additional 25 cents to be retained by selling line, except that from points from which the regular one-way fare to Richmond is less than $1.00, the rate will be one fare for the round trip without the additional 25 cents). These tickets will be good returning, to and including, Tenth month 7th, 1904, and will be on sale at all points on different roads within the limits of Indiana Yearly Meeting. All necessary information can be procured from the Local Agent at the different points.

Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting, New York, was held at South Starksboro, Vt., the 13th and 14th inst. The visitors present were J. L. Spicer, superintendent of evangelistic work; Mary Jane Weaver, national evangelist of the W. C. T. U.; Eliza Hartley, of Ohio, who is visiting her aged mother, Sarah B. Meader; Walter S. Aldrich, who expects to continue in tent meetings at that place and elsewhere, and James Renfrew, of R. I., who has been preaching in Bingham, Me., who is to locate at Monkton Ridge, Vt., in the near future. Mary J. Weaver preached on Seventh-day. W. H. Dean was, as usual, at the clerk's desk. Besides the routine of business a committee was named to bring a subject to the next meeting for consideration. First-day was a great occasion. The house was more than filled; so the windows were taken out, and many sat in carriages near by. There was service of song and prayer; a collection taken for the home work, and J. Renfrew preached from the words, "Where Art Thou?" His discourse was listened to with marked attention.

The Publishing Association of FRIENDS,

Plainfield,

Indiana.

OUR OFFICE FORCE.

On February 15th, 1871, Daniel Hill and John M. Hussey began the publication of the CHRISTIAN WORKER at New Vienna, Ohio. The paper was continued at that point until 1883 with Daniel Hill as editor. In 1883 The Publishing Association of Friends was organized at Chicago and purchased the CHRISTIAN WORKER, and began its publication May 3d, 1883, with Calvin Pritchard as editor.

This Association was incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois. W. B. Wickersham, F. B. Hill, A. H. Pickering, Willit Dorland and T. C. Hill were the leading Friends in this organization and served as Directors. The capital stock of the Association was $15,000. In May, 1891, the capital stock was increased to $30,000, and the Youths' Friends Publishing Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, was consolidated with the Publishing Association of Friends, P. W. Raidabaugh and J. Walter Malone coming into the Association as Directors.

In 1883 the Association began the publication of the Friends' Bible School Quarterly, which reached a circulation of 17,000 by 1890. In 1891 P. W. Raidabaugh was elected editor of the Quarterly and other Sabbath School publications, and Calvin Pritchard retained as editor of the CHRISTIAN WORKER. The business management of the Association was placed in the hands of P. W. Raidabaugh and Calvin Pritchard.

On the 24th of November, 1892, C. W. Pritchard resigned as editor of the CHRISTIAN WORKER, and P. W. Raidabaugh was elected editor, and continued as such until 1894, when the CHRISTIAN WORKER and the FRIENDS' REVIEW, of Philadelphia, were consolidated and published as THE AMERICAN FRIEND, with Rufus M. Jones as editor. The Publishing Association of Friends receiving one-third of the stock of the American Friend Publishing Co., amounting to $10,000.

In 1894 the PRIMARY QUARTERLY was added to the publications. In 1895 the INTERMEDIATE QUARTERLY was added, and in 1896 the TEACHERS' QUARTERLY and also the LESSON SHEET were added. These four Quarterlies reached a circulation of 35,000 in 1901.

In 1891 the Association was sending out four Sabbath School publications, but simply had their heading printed on other publications. The YOUTHS' FRIEND took the place of one of these publications, and was issued in two editions monthly, a sixteen-page edition for general circulation and an eight-page for Sabbath School circulation. In 1900 these juvenile publications were discontinued, and the YOUTHS' FRIEND published as a four-page paper four times a month.

In the fall and winter of 1900 the subject of removal from Chicago was considered for the following reasons:

1. One-half of the Friends of the United States are located within six hours' travel of Indianapolis, and fully one-half of our business is in that territory.

2. Plainfield is only fourteen miles from the Union Depot of Indianapolis, and an electric railway has been completed and cars run every hour into the center of Indianapolis, putting us in close touch with the business center of the city.

3. Indianapolis is one of the largest railroad centers of May 1st, 1901, the business was removed to Plainfield, Ind., and steps taken at once for incorporation under the laws of Indiana. The incorporation papers were completed and finally recorded August 16th, 1901, with the following Directors: B. W. Anderson, President of First National Bank of Plainfield, and a Trustee of Western Yearly Meeting; Lewis Robins, a retired farmer and Trustee of Western Yearly Meeting; Melican Woodard, a retired farmer and Trustee of Western Yearly Meeting; Addison Ballard, Real Estate and Loan the world, and every part of the Union can be reached from that place as well as Chicago.

THE PRIVATE OFFICE.

4. The manager and editor of our publications feels the need of attending Quarterly Meetings, and important points where Friends are located, that he may become more in touch with the great body of Friends. From Chicago, the expense of time and money were too great to do much of this kind of work. From Indianapolis he can reach all points of Western, Indiana and Wilmington Yearly Meetings, with light expense and quick return to business. We are just as near Iowa, Kansas and Western Friends; nearer Ohio, Baltimore and North Carolina, and within as easy reach of Canada, New England and New York as from Chicago.

5. Plainfield being the seat of Western Yearly Meeting, during the session of Yearly Meeting we come in contact with Friends, not only of Western Yearly Meeting, but also visiting Friends, and in this way become acquainted with hundreds, whilst in Chicago we scarcely met a Friend, except it be one delayed in the city when passing through, or some personal friend of the manager.

• Agent; and P. W. Raidabaugh, Manager and Treasurer of the Publishing Association of Friends.

We have installed the most complete printing plant in Hendricks County, and one of the best in the State of Indiana, consisting of a Babcock Cylinder Press, 34x46; a Babcock Standard Press, 24x30; a Job Press for small work; a Mentges Folder; a Donnell Wire Stitcher; a Reliance Paper Cutter and a Sterling Round Cornering Machine. This machinery is run by a Hancock Gasoline Engine. We have also a large assortment of brand new type, borders, etc., which enables us to do all kinds of commercial printing done by large printing houses in large cities. We have two machines that are of the latest invention and show the skill and genius of man.

The wire stitcher is a machine that will take the wire from a coil and drive it through the backs of our Quarterlies and clinch the wire. The machine will stitch wire through half an inch of paper, and is a very handy machine, enabling us to do all kinds of pamphlet work.

The Folder will take a large sheet of paper, run it through and fold into 32-pages at the rate of 1,000 an hour. Our Quar-terlies are printed on one sheet and run through this machine. It will also fold into 8 or 16 pages, and by a special attachment will fold in an additional page or pages and paste it into the body of the pamphlet. The machine folds, pastes and trims an eight or sixteen page paper.

Our machinery is all modern, and the latest and best made.

Our circulations are as follows:

Teachers' Quarterlies	3,200
Advanced Quarterlies	22,500

We are issuing a missionary edition of our Youths' Friend each month, as well as an edition devoted to Temperance and Social Purity. Through these mediums we are endeavoring to impress upon all the scholars attending the Friends' Sabbath Schools, the joy of supporting the cause of missions and the beauty of a pure and chaste life.

Besides this we are constantly issuing tracts for general circulation, having printed during the past six months no less than 110,000 tracts devoted to Temperance, Missionary and Religious subjects.

OUR PRESS ROOM.

Intermediate Quarterlies	8,000
Primary Quarterlies	4,000
Lesson Sheets	5,200
Children's Lesson Leaf	4,800
Youths' Friend (weekly)	4,000
Little Boys and Girls	2,000

Total 54,700

In estimating the total number of pages of religious literature sent from our office during the year, we find the total footing to be 9,140,800 pages.

Our lesson helps are almost universally used in the Friends' Sabbath Schools, and are moulding the thought of our children, those who are to constitute our membership in the future. It is of vast importance that they be thoroughly established in the doctrines of Friends, and that this work and management be under the guidance of the church.

Our Benevolent Work.

We have among us as Friends many of the Lord's poor ones, especially in the Western States, and in many localities they are not able to furnish the children in their Bible Schools with papers and helps needed. We have many calls for help, and could use the entire profits of a much larger business in this helpful work.

Bible Schools are established in some frontier settlement, the children are gathered in for miles, the workers need Bibles, papers, cards, etc., to assist them in their work, and to make it attractive and profitable to the children. Other communities have been prosperous, but successive failure of crops have so reduced the people financially that they cannot procure literature for their children. Then again in cities, where mission work is started with a few faithful Friends, large numbers of children are gathered into the Bible Schools, and these friends do not have the means necessary to provide all they need.

It is our Father's business, and we must help. But the lack of means hinders us from doing all that should be done. We could easily spend $2,000 to $3,000 a year and be a blessing to thousands. Our plan is to help those who are willing to help themselves. We give discounts from 20 to 50 per cent., according to the needs of the schools; and in some cases, when the demand is urgent, supplies are sent free for three to six months. This is a very deserving field in which to place a little money, and will be as productive of good as any educational or missionary work that can be found.

Our Need.

We are occupying a rented building twenty feet wide and extending from the street back to an alley; half a town block in depth. But we are crowded and cannot get the room we need; we must erect a building suitable for our work. In addition to our own work we are printing a county paper weekly; The Missionary Advocate, monthly; The Earlhamite, semi-monthly; The Mirror, monthly. These periodicals are all printed as job work; and we do a large amount of general job work, such as books, pamphlets, letter-heads, sale bills, etc., amounting at the present time to at least $200 per month. This can be increased when we get the room in which to do work to advantage.

To do work like this we need a much larger working capital than we have, as frequently money is locked up in a large job, and we must wait for it until the work is completed. And again a large amount of money is tied up in permanent stock. At the present time we have 1,000 Sabbath School Record Books on hand. We have just completed a Monthly Meeting Record Book, the paper alone costing $150; this with the work of printing and binding has taken about $500. We have a large assortment of tracts, etc. All this work ties up over $1,000. This money will all come back, with a good profit, as these things are sold. It is necessary for us to have $1,000 or $2,000 constantly in this condition. Then many Sabbath Schools are so situated, financially, that they cannot pay promptly, and we must wait for our money from three to six months. We have constantly from $3,000 to $4,000 due us from this source. The paper bills and labor must be paid, whilst we wait for our pay. This money is all good and is finally paid; but it is slow coming in. Friends are good in paying their obligations; if not always so prompt, we do not lose any of our money.

OUR BOND ISSUE.

To equip our printing plant we sold preferred stock, with a guaranteed 8 per cent. dividend. But since then our business has so increased that we must have more room and a larger working capital. Money being plentiful and seeking a safe place for investment, we feel that we should get all the means that we need, as our work is for the church, at 6 per cent., and especially as no taxes are required on money invested with us.

To meet these needs we are issuing twenty-year Gold Bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest. The bonds are non-taxable. That is, the owner of these bonds will not hand them in to the assessor, as we pay all taxes on them. This makes the bond a 7½ to 8½ per cent. investment.

The following are some of the points of safety and advantages:

1. Our visible assets are over double the amount of the bond issue needed.
2. The bonds are issued in amounts of $50.00 and payable in twenty years, July 1st, 1924, or sooner, at the option of the Association.
3. The bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property and assets of the Association. A trustee holds the mortgage, covering the bond issue, in trust for the bondholders. The mortgage covers all the assets of the Association personal and real.
4. The interest will be paid annually. The only thing necessary will be to cut off the coupon and send it to our office when due and get in return the interest check.
5. A sinking fund, into which 5 per cent. of the bond issue will be placed each year, is created, so that the money will be on hand to pay them when due, or to redeem before due at a premium of 5 per cent.
6. The bonds are a good and safe investment, being for 20 years, make them a long-term investment, which usually only brings 3 to 4 per cent.
7. The interest being 6 per cent., and no taxes to be paid on the bonds, makes them really a 7½ or 8½ per cent. investment.
8. The money is invested in a paying business, which is increasing as the church increases.
9. The money in addition to a safe investment, is used in doing good.
10. The bonds can be sold at par at any time, the same as other securities.
11. The Publishing Association of Friends with all its resources, is back of the bonds with over double the bond issue in property, besides its good will.

Friends all over the United States and Canada are requested to invest a little in these bonds. Can not you take from 1 to 10 bonds and assist us in the good work? The money received from the sale of these bonds will be used exclusively for the purpose of redeeming our preferred stock, erecting a building suitable for our purpose and to be used as working capital.

THE MISSIONARY REVIEW.

The present critical situation in Tibet, Manchuria and Japan is ably presented in three articles in "The Missionary Review of the World" for September. In the first Dr. H. O. Dwight describes the siege which is being laid to the "Forbidden Land" and the various missionaries who are waiting around the borders. It is a most interesting and complete account. Dr. John Ross, of Mukden—a veteran missionary—tells of the progress made in Manchuria since the Boxer massacres, describes the present situation and the outlook in view of the conflict now going on between Russia and Japan. The third article is by Rev. T. M. McNair, of Tokyo, and deals with the movements for and against Christianity now at work in the Mikado's Empire. The interview of Dr. Imbue with the Prime Minister is also of particular interest and importance at this time.

The latest news from the world-field is to be found in the Intelligence Department.

MINISTER'S TRIAL.

Coffee Hit Him Hard Indeed.

A minister of the gospel writes about Postum: "I was for years a sufferer from headaches; sometimes they were so violent that groaning in agony I would pace the floor or garden holding my throbbing head for relief.

"I tried all sorts of remedies known to the allopathic and homeopathic schools; sometimes I thought it was caused by the stomach or biliousness, and again I would suspect it was purely nervousness and treated myself accordingly, but nothing ever gave me permanent relief. Having to appear before the public nearly every night, it was sometimes almost impossible for me to fulfill my engagements. Finally I came to suspect that the use of tea and coffee had something to do with my disorder, and abruptly discontinued the use of both and took on Postum for a trial.

"From that happy hour I commenced to mend; gradually I got better and better, and now I do not have a headache once in six months, and all my other troubles are gone too. I am now using Postum exclusively, and want no better beverage.

"I know of others who have been benefited by the use of Postum in place of coffee. A friend of mine here in Key West, a hardware merchant, suffered for years with stomach and other troubles while he was using coffee; finally he quit and began using Postum and got well. He is devoted to Postum, and when worn and weary with business cares takes a cup of it piping hot, and in a short time feels rested and nourished.

"Some I know have become prejudiced against Postum because careless or ignorant cooks tried to make it as they would coffee, and will not allow it to boil full 15 minutes, but when they try it again, well boiled, it stays, for it is as delicious and snappy as the mild, smooth, high-grade Java." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE SEPTEMBER McCURE'S.

"McCure's Magazine" for September is a vigorous expression of American life and interest, part fact, part fiction, all entertaining. Several serious articles give it commanding importance and character. Of these William Allen White writes of "Roosevelt and the Postal Frauds," and in a clear and concise manner he tells the engrossing story of this great crime against the Government and the manner of its exposure. But he does more. He reads the lesson of these events and keenly characterizes the men who made them. It is in all an article which every American citizen will want and ought to read. Ida M. Tarbell gets at the very heart of the trust question in her Standard Oil History in a masterly paper on "The Price of Oil." Here is what the consumer wants to know, how the trust affects prices. Miss Tarbell traces the variation of oil prices under the Standard's manipulations from the beginning, and draws convincing conclusions from an overwhelming array of facts, evidently wrought out with infinite pains.

The highest state of religious life is when a man sacrifices every personal and worldly advantage, encounters every annoyance or peril, if need be, rather than be in the least untrue to what his soul believes the commandments of God.—J. Storrs Smith.

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

Kings are but wraiths, republics fade like rain,
Peoples are reaped and garnered as the grain,
And only that persists which is the truth;
Be strong when all the days of life bear ruth
And fury, and are hot with toil and strain:
Hold thy large faith and quell thy mighty pain:
Dream the great dream that buoys thine age with

He bursts into the boundless morning,—free!*

FIGHTING THE SALOON.

IN ANOTHER column we publish a communication from our friend, C. E. Newlin, which should be read for a proper understanding of this article. He did not intend to be unfair, for he is a true, straightforward man, but he has surely missed the meaning of our too brief treatment of Bishop Potter's unfortunate blunder. We have nothing but disapproval of the entire affair. The Subway Tavern is a liquor saloon, and all the more dangerous because of this attempt to make it "respectable." The more we learn the real facts about it the more dreadful seems to us the part which this high representative of the Church has played. So far as the "Subway" is a "modified" saloon, the modification seems to us rather for the worse than for the better. All this should doubtless have been said clearly and emphatically in our former editorial, and our correspondent would have been justified in pointing out that our condemnation was too mild.

But he is totally wrong if he thinks that there was the slightest glimmer of an approval of the Bishop's act in any word we wrote. This is what we said: "To set up a bar supplied with all the intoxicants makes the 'substitute' too much like the original thing, and then to sanction it in the name of the Church comes dangerously near telling men that liquor drinking is to be recognized as a normal part of Christian life." It not only "comes dangerously near" doing it, it actually does it, or as Dooley has well put it, it treats liquor drinking as "a necessary evil." The whole Subway business will have the effect of intrenching the saloon instead of weakening it, and it is hard to see how any student of the affair can do otherwise than condemn it, as our words were plainly intended to do. Apparently every other reader of them, except the writer of this communication, has taken them as a condemnation.

Our friend has tripped up on the phrases, "a well-intentioned scheme," "a substitute for the saloon" and "poor man's club." In reference to the first phrase, it should be said that there is no question that it is true. Wrong and mistaken as the present "scheme" is, it has come from "good intentions," which we have often heard are "paving-material" in a place none of us wish to go to! Bishop Potter's intentions cannot be called in question. He has all his life aimed to advance righteousness, and he has done this particular thing because he thought it was right—but that does not make it right. "Good intention" is only a very small factor in a moral battle. One must get on the side God is on to accomplish anything.

The necessity for some substitute for the saloon is now recognized by practically every student of the saloon in every country. We certainly must "provide another occupation for the counterfeiter and horse thief before we can compel them to quit their present occupation." That is just the conclusion of all our prison experts—of everybody who has studied crime. Nobody is safely reformed until he is well established in a good pursuit. Notwithstanding the refutation of the Indianapolis "News," the testimony of all recent students of sociology is that the saloon is the poor man's and working man's "club." It is the place he goes to for his social life and for his political discussions, precisely as in a New England country village the men flock to the "corner grocery." Now men are going to gather somewhere. At present they gather in saloons. Undoubtedly the drink is a great factor, but the fellowship is also a great factor. The statement that "the frequenter of the saloon goes there for the alcoholic stimulants he gets there, and for nothing else" cannot be maintained. Nor is it true that "coffee houses" and other institutions where alcoholic drinks are not sold have proved a failure. Quite the contrary. They have proved, where properly conducted, a very great success, as any one who has studied them in Birmingham, for instance, can testify. The plan for furnishing a genuine substitute—a place where workmen would feel thoroughly at home—is only in its earliest infancy, but it is a work which deserves every serious person's encouragement.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

IT HAS always been difficult to deal with "offenders" so that the very best course shall be taken both for the meeting and for the offender. It is, of course, highly important for a Christian Church to exhibit a forgiving and a long-suffering spirit, like that of the Master; and every tinge of harshness and vindictiveness must vanish from the action of a monthly meeting. There must, too, be every effort made for the redemption and reinstatement of the erring brother.

But on the other hand the meeting has no right to ignore its own standing before the world. It is bound to maintain a standard of righteousness and purity. If it treats its erring members as though their sins and mistakes were small matters and easily to be whitewashed, it will soon blur over the distinction between right and wrong, between sin and holiness, and it will lose its power in the community.

Where the offender has violated Disciplinary regulations only, the case is much less serious, for these are matters which concern only the Church itself. Where the offense is moral the necessity for action is much more urgent, for the Church owes something to the community, and it must always be more or less a guardian of the moral life of its members.

THE clerks of monthly and quarterly meetings should note what the Uniform Discipline says in reference to liberating ministers for service in other yearly meetings. Here is a clause from that Discipline: "In every case where a certificate for ministerial service is granted, the clerk and the correspondent of the meeting finally granting it, shall sign the same, and this meeting shall see that the minister is properly provided with means for the accomplishment of the service." This is in line with ancient custom, and it is a wise requirement. No meeting should allow a minister to go out bearing its endorsement and approval without knowing where the means are coming from for the proposed service, and if the meeting is unwilling to be responsible for the expense it ought to decline to issue credentials, unless it is informed that the expense is to be covered in some other proper way.

There should be no looseness in these matters, because it cannot fail to bring disgrace upon the church which allows it, and it always weakens the service of a minister to be dependent upon the favor of those among whom he labors.

THE current number of the "British Friend" is strong and valuable. It deals with many aspects of practical Christianity. It is regrettable that more copies of it are not taken here in America. Two articles in this number are peculiarly interesting to American readers—one by Catharine Albright on the Haverford Summer School, and one by A. Neave Brayshaw on "A Marvelous Biography." This latter article is a review of Buell's William Penn, a book which is well nigh saturated with stupid and painful errors. Our Friend quotes one very amusing sentence, to the effect that George Fox advised "a peculiar style of dress for each sex which he himself designed and set the example of wearing"! It is amazing that a reputable publisher should have issued a book marked by such bad taste, slovenly history and ignorance of the real qualities of the person he treats.

IT is extremely painful to read the daily reports from the scenes of carnage on the further shore of the Pacific. Many of us have used strong adjectives to paint the horrors and the hellishness of war. But the sober accounts which are now coming in day by day surpass our most lurid pictures. The sight of what is transpiring at this moment at Port Arthur would send many of us into hopeless insanity. It is almost unbelievable that human beings can fight as these two human groups have fought for the past few months. The brooks on these slopes have flowed actually with blood, and every foot of soil has exhibited its ghastly mark of man's inhumanity to man. How long!

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE HELP OF HEADWINDS.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

Human life is a voyage, but our Heavenly Father does not give us the control of the weather. If He did, we should be apt to choose nothing but smooth seas, fair winds, full cargoes and secure harbors. God is wiser than we are, and He no more consults us than I consult my grass-plot as to when I shall use the mower, or my grape vines whether I shall prune away the surplus branches.

On a certain night we are told that Jesus Christ directed His disciples to cross the lake of Galilee. He knew that a storm was coming, but He did not tell them. They found it out for themselves before they had gone very far; and Peter, who was an "old hand" on that lake, had never known a rougher night or an angrier sea. The wind is right in their teeth, and the waves hammer the bow of their fishing smack like iron sledges. With all their sturdy pulls at the oars, they make but little headway. They are learning some lessons at night; and so are some of my readers who are now passing through storms of trouble and are enveloped by the darkness of a mysterious Providence. They are learning the blessings of the headwinds, and what spiritual help they might bring to us.

Prosperity very often breeds self-conceit, both in a Christian, in a church and in a nation. We take to ourselves the credit. When we are "hard up" we are apt to call upon God for what we need; when we have got it, we are equally apt to set it down to our own skill or our own seamanship. Prosperous churches congratulate themselves on the eloquence and popularity of their pastor, on the inflow of people to their pews, and of money into their contribution boxes. When the children of Israel had things to their liking, they forgot God and turned idolators; when calamities overtook them, they were driven back to God, and cried lustily for His delivering arm. One of the subtlest forms of sin is self-direction. We ignore God and set up a will and choose a way of our own. He is too wise and too loving to allow this, and He often sends a stiff gale into our faces for our chastisement and correction. Whom He loveth He chasteneth; the self-willed and the rebellious are left to go on the rocks.

Headwinds strengthen the sinews and develop strong characters. Many of our Americans who have attained to the highest work of honor and usefulness were "seasoned" in their youth by sharp adversity. As Joseph was prepared by a pit and a prison for the premiership of Egypt, so Abraham Lincoln was educated for his high calling by severe study of a few books in a log cabin, and by eating the tonic bread of a laborious poverty. If he had been born in the brown-stone mansion of a great city and reared in luxury, his biography would have read very differently, and perhaps history might never have heard of him. Probably the best part of George Washington's training for his destiny was his rough experiences in the frontier wilderness. I seriously doubt whether the luxurious style of life in some of the highly-endowed and fashionable present-day universities turns out as stalwart a type of intellectual manhood as was produced in the plain, uncarpeted rooms of the old-fashioned primitive-looking colleges. Silver spoons and soft raiment are not the regimen for heroes. Smooth seas and gentle breezes never make a sailor.

This same truth applies to the spiritual experiences of God's people. The great purpose of our Heavenly Father in this school-life on earth is to develop a vigorous godly character. "Count it all joy, my brethren," said the Apostle James, "when ye fall into manifold trials, knowing that the trying of your faith worketh patience." Afflictions often come upon bad people for their sins; but God sometimes sends afflictions upon good people to make them still better. That hard rowing in the night-storm on Galilee proved the disciples' pluck and gave new fiber to their sinews. They were learning to "endure hardness," and were rehearsing their subsequent experiences in the teeth of persecuting Sanhedrins and bloodthirsty Herods.

Adversity brings out the graces and the beauties of the noblest Christian character. As a fine mansion is often concealed in rich summer foliage, but stands out in its architectural beauty when wintry winds have stripped the trees bare, so we find that many Christians show their graces to better advantage when God has let loose the tempests on them. The furnace of affliction is heated up for gold—not for gravel stones. Then, too, the seasons of trial make us more watchful. In smooth weather the sailor may swing in his hammock; but a piping gale brings all hands on deck, and sharpens the eye of the "look-out" at the bow. David never fell during his seasons of severe trouble; it was the warm, sunny days of prosperity that brought out the adders. Noah weathered through the deluge of water nobly; it was the deluge of wine that drowned him! Ah, brethren, I suspect that when in another world we examine the chart of our voyagings, we shall discover that the headwinds—trying at the time—gave us the most headway towards heaven.

The crowning blessing of all such adverse experiences is that they teach us our utter dependence on God. The poor prodigal forgot his father when he was among the harlots; but he began to think of him when he got down to the husks. Danger sends us to our knees. The hour of our extremity is the hour of God's opportunity. When the disciples were at the very crisis of the storm, lo! the welcome form of Jesus appears on the waves, and the welcome voice of Jesus is heard through the tempest, "It is I: be of good cheer; be not afraid!" As soon as He sets foot in the boat, the tornado hushes into a calm.

Dear friends, you may find that it is a blessed wind that brings Christ to you. Welcome Him into your vessel. No craft ever foundered with Christ on board. No struggling soul, no afflicted Christian, no sorely-tried church has ever gone down when once the Son of God has come to their relief. The fiercest headwinds and the angriest waves obey His voice; and so will He bring you at last into your desired haven.

"As a mother stills her child,
Thou canst hush the ocean wild;
Boisterous winds obey Thy will
When Thou sayest to them, 'Be still!'
Wondrous Sovereign of the sea,
Jesus, Savior, pilot me!"

THE MAN WITH THE MEASURING REED.

BY HENRY FORCE.

This man with the measuring reed is introduced to us by Ezekiel (Ezekiel 40: 4, 5), but he is undoubtedly still in existence and as busy as he was in the time of that eminent prophet. There is a good deal of measuring being done in the world. The word of God intimates very plainly that our thoughts and actions are subject to divine testing, and most of us have a consciousness that we are weighed in the balances and found wanting. We forget it sometimes, however, and are guilty of discounting our duty, of trying to pass off thirty-five inches to the yard among our fellowmen, and feeling more sorrow when we are discovered at our tricks than when we commit the wrong acts. The man with the measuring reed takes cognizance of our short-comings, of our false weights and measurements, of all our deceitful words and deeds, and it would save us many an hour of remorse and self-reproach if we would remember the measuring man and keep our lives up to his ideal.

We ought to do a deal of measuring ourselves. We know well enough what to be and to do, and cannot excuse ourselves on the ground of ignorance. It is well to measure our beliefs. The apostle Peter bids us be ready to give a reason of the hope that is in us. We should believe not recklessly, yet not too reluctantly. The indifference of the Thessalonians was condemned by inference, as the conduct of the Bereans was commended, as the latter received the word preached with all readiness of mind, examining the Scriptures daily, for confirmation or otherwise, of the things heard, something the Thessalonians failed to do. Probably fifty per cent. of our church members could not tell just what they believe, and would find it even more difficult to tell why they believe what they do profess. Many of us believe just what we were taught to believe by our fathers and mothers. What was good enough for them appears to be good enough for us. This is an unsubstantial ground for faith. At the same time, we need not deem our creed antiquated and out of date because it was the creed of our parents. A creed that has been thought out, and wrought out, and fought out, in generations past, is worthy of thoughtful consideration, and if some portions of it must go they should not be carelessly dismissed as unworthy of house-room, but replaced, as far as possible, with something strongly supported by the Bible.

Our characters need measuring. It is well to have the good reputation if the character does not lag far behind it. Our aim should be to make our character what it ought to be, and then let the reputation take care of itself. Reputation is what we seem; character is what we are. The Lord seeth not as man seeth. Man's opinion of us may be flattering, while God's knowledge of us may call for our condemnation. A four-square character is not an easy thing to maintain. Turned inside out some of us would present a sorry picture. There is much plate that passes for silver, much brass that is supposed to be gold, many a paste diamond that passes for the real article. A diamond reputation and a paste character will come into conflict sooner or later, and then there will be trouble.

We should measure our thoughts. We indulge in evil thoughts even though, very often, we have not the slightest intention of carrying them out, because we suppose that our thoughts cannot be read by others. God's word has some important things to say about a man's thoughts. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," is a statement to which it would be quite useless to take exception. "A penny for your thoughts," says some curious friend who sees the absent look upon the face, but not for many pennies, nor for many pounds, would we sometimes want to declare our thoughts. "The thought of foolishness is sin," says the divine word, and according to that line of measurement we must have made some serious records against ourselves. God bids the unrighteous man forsake his thoughts as well as his wicked way. Low thoughts, base thoughts, uncharitable and envious thoughts all serve to make character and to make it unworthy of any man. High thinking, noble thinking, thinking for others, all tend to make a man noble and good and true. An old hymn says:

"My thoughts before they are my own
Are to my God distinctly known."

He reads them all. What a mercy that He does not read them aloud, so that others should know us as He knows us.

We should measure our words. The gift of speech is a great blessing if rightly used. But since by our words we are to be justified or condemned, for so Christ tells us, we need a divine watch set before our mouth. Words slip out so easily. One word leads to another. It is so easy, even in the case of our best friends, to come to words in a pugnacious way, that we may well interview the man with the measuring reed and get our bearing occasionally and so keep our words up to the standard. We might not thus always have the last word, but it is safe to say that we should less often speak unadvisedly with our lips. Words of malice and hate, words that cover an untruthful inference, and are meant to do so, though not regarded as direct lies, are a disgrace to any man. Evasive answers are often a sin, being a coward's reply, because he has not the courage to tell the truth.

In view of the fact that the vocabulary of the average man is limited, a few thousand words and even less, it is surprising how many times a man sins with his tongue. He must misuse the same words many times over. Every one of us ought to read what the Apostle James has to say about the tongue. He writes in caustic style—lunar caustic, almost, for his words bite and burn. It is just the man with the measuring reed over again. Grace, divine grace, and nothing else, can control the tongue and help us to measure our words so that we may not offend and bring ourselves up with a short turn before the bar of judgment.

We should measure our achievements. We promise ourselves a useful life, but looking back, as the decades go, it is sometimes hard to see what of good we have accomplished. We have done nothing, at best, of which to boast before God, but it is the privilege of every one of us to so live that as the years go by we may be able to feel that we have not lived in vain, but have carried out some of our noble purposes and fulfilled some of our worthy designs. Nevertheless, measuring our deeds by the standard of what we could have done, we shall find that we have fallen short. Of him to whom much is given much shall justly be required. Since God is able to make all grace abound toward us, thus affording us all sufficiency for abounding in good works, achievement along the line of service to God and man is due. No excuses will avail in the day when all lives will be finally measured. Christ comes again and His reward is with Him, to give every man as his work shall be. Christ will be the Man with the measuring reed.

THE BIBLE SCHOOL AN EVANGELISTIC FORCE.*

BY J. LINDLEY SPICER.

Jesus Christ, the great Teacher, spent much time alone with God. We must dig deep and stand upon the primeval rock of truth, as did the early Friends. On this foundation alone our building will stand. "In the beginning God." The dawning of His thoughts in our minds shall be a new creation. Then our lives may become a continually ascending hymn of praise.

What has been burned into our own souls we may impress upon another.

"Alone, and not alone I stand,
Around, above, a power divine
Is shining, and a heavenly hand
Is touching mine.

"And voices which amid the din
Of outward life, I could not hear
Are gently whispering within Their words of cheer."

The evangelizing teacher must know the voice of God and be much alone with Him.

The inner chamber, then the housetop. Abiding in the upper room until the promise of the Father is fulfilled. Then beginning to speak as the Spirit giveth utterance. Spirit filled teachers then spirit filled scholars.

Bible school workers should confidently expect the conversion of every child. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." And of such is the kingdom of God upon earth. For 90 per cent. of all who accept Jesus Christ do so before they are twenty years of age. Browning wrote:

"The highest faith,
Makes the highest man,
For we grow like the things
Our souls believe.
And rise or sink,
As we aim high or low."

The ideal Bible school is the entire Church. Young and old united in studying the Scriptures for instruction in righteousness, to know the mind of Christ and to become proficient in the use of the Bible.

The Great Teacher met every assault of the slanderer with "It is written again." The Psalmist hid the "Word" in his heart that he might not sin against God. Our ways are cleansed: "By taking heed according to thy word." In the Christian soldier's equipment we are commanded to "Take the sword of the Spirit." The Holy Spirit brings to our remembrance "Whatsoever He hath spoken." Aim to hear what He speaks, then to speak what we hear.

First, Bible-filled teachers, then Bible-filled scholars. To store the mind with exact Scripture knowledge is the true foundation for the superstructure of faith and the intelligent acceptance of Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal.

The electric masseur places a light in your hand, and then deftly passes a well-charged sponge over the stiffened joints. You are so full of power no one can touch you without receiving a shock. God has put the Bible—a lamp—into your hand. The Holy Spirit will so thrill your entire being with Himself that your formalism and stiff-kneed inactivity will disappear, and none can approach you without being impressed helpfully for God and Christian living.

In Glasgow there is a simple headstone with this inscription: "She did no miracle, but what she said about Jesus was true, and many believed because of her." This was the loving tribute paid to an humble, conscientious Bible school teacher who taught and lived Jesus Christ in the world.

In evangelistic and church extension work we find those who have been best instructed in Bible truth are most easily won to Christian activity. Because they "know" his will, they "do" his pleasure.

The ideal church has a place for children in its worship as well as in its school. It is a church where young and old unite in worshipping the living God in a living trust and faith. Children's meetings and a children's portion of the regular morning meeting have been a blessed part of worship in many places. There is no more inspiring sight for a preacher than to have the front seats filled with bright-faced, expectant children. And this portion of the church has more of hope in it than any other for the future.

At one of our meetings, after a well-conducted school, about forty bright children filled the front of the house, and were as well behaved and attentive as any person present. Later, in special meetings, many of them were converted, joined the meeting and became active soul winners. Soul-winning teachers, then soul-winning scholars.

For a Bible teacher to know the streams of power is not enough; they must know how to transform Niagaras into electric force. Then there is unlimited production to meet every need. Waste material is transmuted into power and beauty. The clear light drives sin and darkness out.

The pre-historic mound builder was a marvel, no doubt, in his age. With his flint arrow tip he might kill his foe five hundred feet away. The newest Springfield rifle kills at five miles. The savage might possibly drive his arrow through one victim into the second man. The nickel-tipped projectile of to-day, impelled by a half-teaspoonful of smokeless powder, would penetrate fifty-five men. Twenty-five rounds of ammunition was more of a burden for the soldier during the rebellion of 1861 than 200 rounds now.

Has the Church of Christ—the branch known as Friends—kept up in effective aggressiveness with the powers of darkness? Christ-impelled teachers, then Christ-impelled scholars. Traditional methods must give way as surely as the stage coach has been superseded by the express train. If our teachers and workers are not fully equipped our keen high school boys and girls will graduate—out and away.

A bright lad told me of his public school teacher: "He's a hustler. I tell you, we fellers just have to learn. He's all right." When asked about his Bible school teacher he said: "Oh, say, she's good all right, and means well, but— Well, I ain't going any more."

Every Bible school teacher is a pastor of a little church of from two to twenty members. Some of his pupils come from ungodly homes. The teacher has one-half hour out of three hundred and thirty-six in a week to impress that soul for God, and yet some teachers seem to think, "Oh! anything will do if I only keep order." The secular teacher has sixty half hours a week. And how much time does evil or thoughtless companions have in the moulding of character?

I asked a group of street urchins playing crap in a Cincinnati alley: "What are you good for, anyways, boys?" One dirty-faced, sharp-eyed boy responded: "We're the stuff they make men of. Give us a show, will you?" Yes, Bible school workers, the boys and girls are pleading for an even chance to know God, and the teachings of His blessed book.

If we lose the children we lose all, and the Church of the future is doomed.

Spirit-filled, Bible-filled, soul-winning, Christ-impelled teachers—four square, like the city of God—are coming down out of heaven. The teacher behind the class, but God behind the teacher, is a true evangelizing force.

"RESIST NOT EVIL." *

BY WILLIAM G. HUBBARD.

In the first chapter of his interesting book, "Nature of the State," Clarence S. Darrow denies the common theory of government, "that it is to preserve order and defend the weak." It began, he says, by aggression, and is continued by violence and force. In the beginning "the strongest savage seized the largest club and enforced his rule over the other members of the tribe." Thus he became chief, not to protect the weak, but to rule over them and "to take the good things of the earth to himself." The writer argues that the same principle, only shorn of a little of its rigor, prevails in all governments today.

Even in democratic governments, where the people are supposed to choose their rulers, the strong force themselves upon the people by trick and intrigue, and rule for their own benefit, not for the good of all.

He asserts: "The history of the past and present proves that if there is, or ever was, any large class, from whom society needed to be saved, it is those same rulers. . . . From the early kings who, with blood-red hands, forbade their subjects to kill their fellow men, to the modern legislator, who, with the bribe money in his pocket, still makes bribery a crime, these rulers have ever made laws not to govern themselves, but to enforce obedience on their serfs." And the habit of the governing classes is still to take "the good things of the earth" from the weak and divide them among themselves.

In the second chapter the writer portrays graphically how the authority of the state is maintained by violence and force.

Thousands of churches profess to believe Christ's teaching of non-resistance to evil and of "peace on earth and good will to men," and yet great bodies of men "are trained to kill their fellows for the preservation of existing things."

Europe is a great military camp, and "America, feeling the flush of victory and the glow of conquest, is gathering great armies and navies." These armies must be supported in worse than useless idleness by the labor of the poor. Other millions in Europe and America are being trained to war and made to believe that it is their duty "to desert their homes and trades and offer up their lives to satisfy the vain ambitions of the ruler of the state." Other millions are making guns, building forts and battleships and implements of war. The great burden of it all rests upon the poor.

The governments make laws to punish infanticide and encourage marriage and the rearing of children, yet on the merest whims of rulers these lives, reared at so great cost of efforts, tears, struggle and money of the parents, are squandered as though they were of no more consequence than the grass of the field.

"In these bloody conflicts the poor have met death in a thousand sickening ways, to uphold the prowess of the ruler whose sole function has been to pillage and rob the poor victims that fate has placed within his power."

The author condemns the teaching of patriotism as preparing the mind for war and violence. He takes the broader plane of world-wide brotherhood. Our love should be wider than the national boundaries; it should reach all the race. In discussing the "Purpose of Armies," he contends that the nations of the earth are friendly. We do not need armies and navies to fight our foreign brethren, but armies serve to furnish places in which the favored few may be officers, and serve to keep the masses in the place prescribed for them by the rulers.

"No ruler can love his subjects when he takes their money and their labor to buy cannon, and train men to shoot them down." The writer argues that governing through fear leads to hatred and will finally overthrow the state. On the other hand, "To disband armies and destroy the forts, to diffuse love and brotherhood . . . would create a stronger state, a higher manhood, than the world has ever known."

His discussion of this part of the subject is a powerful argument against war. He tears away the veil, the tinsel and paraphernalia with which apologists have covered war and lets the bloody monster stand forth in all his horridness as the devourer of human beings.

A wide reading of his book would be useful to civilization. While his sentences quiver with life, and scintillate with light, and startle with new truths boldly set forth, and fairly astound you with new propositions, yet the beneficent spirit that pervades the whole book commands admiration and respect.

It is in his attack upon our courts as institutions of "injustice" and upon all prisons as institutions of "violence" that most readers will call him an extremist. He argues the impossibility of the judge knowing the extent of guilt of the prisoner because of so many external and internal influences that may have led to the commission of the act, most of which the judge cannot know. Hence he cannot give judgment. "The sentence is often influenced by the appetite or breakfast of the judge."

Again, punishment is not remedial. It is only for vengeance. There is a rich and powerful man who has "appropriated the good things of the earth to himself." The poor, weak man steals from him to keep his family from starving. The court sends the poor man to the "pen." It considers not the injustice of depriving the wife and little children of a father's labor and help. The family is ruined, the children become criminals, and the wife driven to shame by the violence of court and prison.

"Remove dire poverty, as could be easily done with a tithe of what is now spent on force." Lift up the vicious into higher conditions by love and help, and inducement to commit crime could not exist. Love is not induced by clubs and guns. "These only prevent the true brotherhood that shall yet rule the world."

While courts and prisons brutalize, he does not expect that these shall be immediately abolished, but softened and improved till public thought is prepared to seek out causes of crime and remove them as carefully as we drain the swamps to prevent miasma. His last paragraph shows his beautiful purpose:

"Hatred, bitterness, violence and force bring only bad results—they leave an evil stain on everything they touch. No human soul can be rightly reached except through charity, humanity and love."

UNCONSCIOUS INFLUENCE.

BY ALIX.

Once a little sunbeam was sent to earth, with the command to brighten its dark places.

When at night the sunbeams were gathered in, and it was questioned as to how it had performed its duty, it answered that "it had sought vainly to obey, as it had found only light and beauty everywhere."

"Did'st thou carry perfume into the closed buds of the flowers?" gently asked the angel who had sent it forth.

"Yes, and they opened under my touch into wonderful fragrance and loveliness," was the answer.

"Did'st thou brood over the little seeds that have been so long hidden in the earth?"

"Yes, and as they felt my warmth, the mold that had been their prison house was cleft, and they sprang to my embrace. It will not be long before the gardens will be fair with their bloom."

"Did'st thou visit the chamber of the mourner?"

"Yes, and as I kissed her eyelids, as she slept, she dreamed of heaven and smiled. The memory of that dream will comfort her waking hours."

"A storm raged over the earth. Did not its shadow fall upon thee?"

"No, for I hid, for the time, in the heart of a Christian who read in it only a fresh evidence of the power of Him who was her everlasting friend, and when it ended I painted the covenant lesson I had learned from her upon the clouds, and many voices praised the beauty of the rainbow."

The angel smiled. "Thou hast done well," he said. "Thou hast found no darkness because thou thyself art light, and thy presence dissipates all gloom. Thou hast not failed in obedience. Thy influence has been no less real because it has been unconscious."

JOSEPH HARRISON.

The death of Joseph Harrison, at his home in Pennsylvania, removes from the earth a true man and a consecrated worker. We print a short account of him taken from the "Interchange" of Baltimore:

At his home at Windber, Pa., on the 26th of Sixth month, Joseph Harrison, a minister of Curwensville Monthly Meeting.

Probably but few of our members were acquainted with this dear friend, as he never resided in a town where there was a Friends' Meeting, but in his own Quarterly Meeting he was greatly valued. He was born in Wales and his boyhood was passed in the neighborhood of the town of Meath. One day walking with his father they saw some Friends, and young Joseph asked who these strangely-dressed people were. "They are Quakers, my son," replied his father, "a very mistaken people." And then and there, sitting down on a low stone wall, he explained the doctrines of these "mistaken people" to his son. The boy said nothing, but he thought to himself, "when I grow to be a man, I will be a Quaker," and so it came to pass. Removing to America he came into contact with Friends in Pennsylvania, and soon requested membership. For many years he did the ordinary work of a miner in the Pennsylvania coal mines, and though he might have been promoted by the company, he chose to continue as he was for the sake of working with his boys. His large family was carefully trained in the fear of the Lord and instructed in the principles that were so dear to his own heart. As they grew up several of them also requested membership, and all showed an esteem and love for their father's people.

Joseph Harrison's last public service was in attending the Four-Months' Meeting at Bellefonte last Second month, and paying a visit afterwards to Clearfield County, where he three times attended the meeting at Curwensville. It was his intention to proceed in a visit to Fishertown also, but sickness prevented this. He returned to his home at Windber, and there for several weeks his strength failed rapidly. Three weeks before the close he took to his bed. He suffered a good deal, but his end was a peaceful, falling sleep in Jesus. By his special request he was laid in the cemetery at Curwensville near to his old friend, Zachariah McNaull; we much regret that no Friends minister could be present, but it seemed providential that Benjamin Lewis who had formerly worked with Joseph Harrison in the mines at Horatio, and who resides in West Virginia should have come to Windber just at that time. It was peculiarly fitting that he who had been first led to the Lord by the efforts of our Friend should bear testimony to his Christian character at his funeral. He took for his text the first Psalm, and showed how Joseph Harrison's life had been an illustration of that Psalm. A few words were also spoken by several others.

Our Friend leaves a widow and many grown-up sons and daughters. These with their husbands and wives were all present at the funeral.

"Our aim should not be to excel another, but to rise to the highest there is in us."

ELIJAH TAKEN UP INTO HEAVEN.

2 Kings 2: 1-11.

First-day, Ninth mo. 11.—The transfiguration. Luke 9: 28-36.

Time.—Uncertain; probably about 855 B.C.

Place.—Somewhere east of the Jordan, probably in Gilead; some have thought on the slopes of Mt. Nebo.

Rulers.—Jehoram (Joram), son of Ahab, King of Israel; Jehoshaphat, and probably co-ruler with him, his son Jehoram; Benhadad in Syria.

There is no parallel account in Chronicles.

The history of Elijah is given to us in a series of scenes often without direct connection; there are abrupt and strange appearances and disappearances. The present lesson is a disconnected scene. The first chapter of 2 Kings should be read.

1. "When the Lord would take up Elijah." The Lord chose the time of Elijah's departure, not Elijah. God knew when his work was done. "Elijah went with Elisha." The exact period that they had been together is not stated; probably it was about ten years. Compare 1 Kings 19: 21; 2 Kings 3: 11. "Gilgal." Not the Gilgal near Jericho, but probably one in the hill country of Ephraim about seven miles northwest of Bethel. There was probably a school of the prophets here (2 Kings 4: 38).

2. They all doubtless knew that the departure of Elijah was at hand. Why Elijah wished Elisha to remain behind is not stated. "The Lord hath sent me as far as Bethel." His journey was marked out for him. Bethel was a place where there was a school of the prophets. "As the Lord liveth," etc. This phrase expresses the most intense earnestness. Compare Judg. 8: 17; Ruth 3: 13; 1 Sam. 14: 39; 1 Sam. 1: 26; 1 Sam. 20: 3; 25: 26.

3. "Sons of the prophets." These were young men who were attending the schools of the prophets, which were the theological seminaries of the day. The law of Moses and the history of the Israelites were probably the subjects taught. "Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master?" They had in some way been informed of the fact. They recognized that there was a special bond between Elijah and Elisha. See 1 Kings 19: 16. "I know it; hold ye your peace." The subject was too sacred to be discussed.

4. Again Elijah asks Elisha to leave him, probably to test his affection and faithfulness still more. Jericho, a city which played an important part in Jewish history. It was about twelve miles from Bethel, but in the plain, fully 1,200 feet lower. It was destroyed by Joshua. It was rebuilt in Ahab's reign (1 Kings 16: 34), and was the seat of one of the schools of the prophets. Compare Josh. 6: 26.

5. In Jericho the incidents which happened at Bethel were repeated.

6. "To Jordan." Elijah was familiar with this country beyond Jordan. He had fled there from Ahab; he had been probably born in Gilead. Compare 1 Kings 17: 1-3. "They two went on." They were to have no companions on the solemn journey.

7. "And fifty men of the sons of the prophets." This seems a large number when we remember how much is said of the spread of idolatry, for Jericho was in the kingdom of Israel. Besides this there were schools of the prophets at Gilgal, and possibly on Mt. Carmel. Possibly these schools were in the nature of places of retirement. "Stood over against them." R. V. They stood looking towards the two as they went away. They were near enough to be witnesses, but far away enough not to be in their company. It was well that there should be some witnesses of at least some of the wonderful events which were being enacted. "They two stood by Jordan." Elijah and Elisha. Jordan was only a few miles from Jericho.

8. "Elijah took his mantle." This was doubtless of sheepskin. See 2 Kings 1: 8. Where "he was a hairy man" almost without doubt refers to his clothing, and not to his person. Compare Zech. 13: 4, R. V.; also, Matt. 3: 4. A garment of skin, covered with the hair, seems to have been the distinctive garb of a prophet. The mantle, then, was a symbolical article, and was well suited for an instrument with which to work a miracle. It implied that the power belonged to the office and not to the individual. "Wrapped it together." In a roll, resembling a rod. Moses had with his rod smote the waters of the Nile. Ex. 7: 17, 20. "They were divided." Compare the incident of Joshua near this very spot. Josh. 3: 13; also, Ex. 14: 21; 2 Kings 5: 14. This can only be explained as a miracle. This incident would easily have been seen by the men mentioned in verse 7.

9. "When they were gone over." Or, "As they went over." There was now no other school of the prophets to visit, and Elisha must have felt that the departure of his master was close at hand. They may have been ascending the slopes of Mount Nebo, where Moses had died. "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away." Such a question would test both the affection and the character of Elisha. "I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." That is, let me have the eldest son's portion, and take the place of an eldest son as regards thee and thy prophet's office. I cannot be Elijah, but let me be his representative and as far as may be carry on his work, or my work in his spirit. Compare Deut. 21: 17.

10. "Thou hast asked a hard thing." Because it was something that Elijah could not give. "If thou see me." "The vision of heavenly realities is withheld from ordinary men; if that gift should be bestowed on Elisha, it will be the sign that God has answered his prayer."

11. This account must not be taken with literal exactness. The chariots and horses would convey to the Hebrew mind the idea of Jehovah's omnipotence. The light and flame were like horses and chariots. "A whirlwind." Literally, "a storm." Compare Ezek. 1: 4-14; Job 38: 1; Nahum 1: 3; Psa. 18: 6-16; 104: 3, 4. The only similar events are the translation of Enoch and the ascension of Christ.

TOPIC FOR NINTH MONTH ELEVENTH.

WHAT THE BIBLE TEACHES ABOUT HEAVEN.

John 14: 1-3; Rev. 21: 1-8.

Second-day, Ninth mo. 5.—Is God's habitation. 1 Kings 8: 27-30.

Third-day, Ninth mo. 6.—The home of the saints. Isa. 51: 9-11.

Fourth-day, Ninth mo. 7.—For the pure only. Rev. 7: 13-17.

Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 8.—Our treasures there. Matt. 6: 19-21.

Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 9.—A place of blessedness. Matt. 25: 34-40.

Seventh-day, Ninth mo. 10.—Beyond description. 1 Cor. 2: 8-10.

Heaven has been defined as "A prepared place for a prepared people," and inasmuch as God has charged Himself with the preparation of both place and occupants, we can have no doubt as to their quality nor as to the suitableness of the one for the other.

To those to whom the idea of place seems too material, and who wish to think only on the state of the redeemed, we can answer that there are assuredly to be existence and the conscious, mutual presence of distinct beings. Whether or not there be harps and streets of gold and glassy seas, we can abundantly assure ourselves of the realization of our Lord's word, "Where I am, there ye shall be also"; and the fulfillment of this one promise seemed all-sufficient to David when he wrote, "In Thy presence is fullness of joy, and at Thy right hand are pleasures for evermore."

But heaven stands not merely for a place of blissful consciousness of present blessing; there is "the song of Moses the servant of God," as well as "the song of the Lamb." The memory of the years of tutelage, of all the way by which He led us, of our training in the law of obedience and service in which Moses wrought faithfully—this is the treasure that we may take with us into that abode; and poor, indeed, are they who, saved though as through fire, enter in while their works are burned; but "If any man's work shall abide, he shall receive a reward."

The finest memories are not those repicturings in the mind's gallery of the emotional or intellectual states that were enjoyed in some previous experience, but the matured character and habit that are the constant record of the years spent in the spirit of helpfulness and trust that form the Christian's atmosphere and shape his life. Both memory and memorial is the life of that saint whose victory through Christ is the theme of his own joyous contemplation and an eloquent witness while he is spared to serve here; and the stepping over is not an impoverishing but an enriching, not an unclothing, but a being clothed upon.

Heaven is an impossibility to an unready man. None could learn the "new song" save the hundred and forty and four thousand of the redeemed. Those who choose and dwell in sin here become so blinded and stupefied by it that their powers of enjoying heaven have perished with their capacities of conceiving it or even in any true sense recognizing it.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

A WELCOME.—M. H. J.

No joy bells rang their peal aloud,
But in glad hearts they swung;
Pledges of faithfulness were vowed,
Tears of thanksgiving softly flowed,
Hymns faltered on the tongue.

All for a baby maiden sweet,
Whose speech is but a cry;
Her coming makes life's gifts complete,
God's blessings wait the tiny feet,
Love prays as days go by.

To the Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

As the autumn yearly meeting comes on in course a deep concern is upon our hearts for the toiling thousands of our members who are barred the blessings of these annual feasts. A large per cent. of us have a struggle to maintain our families, pay church dues and support our pastor; have not the wherewith to carry us to the great feast of the year, and pay board a week; have wished and longed for one day's rations. Pray for us, and set an hour every day that we may receive our measure of inspiration and uplift from our Father in heaven.

T. R. WOODARD, Knightstown, Ind.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Dear Friend: I have never been more astounded or hurt than when I read on page 523 of THE AMERICAN FRIEND of Eighth month 11th in the discussion of Bishop Potter's dedicating of the New York Subway Saloon, the following astonishing statement: "It is a well-intentioned scheme to find a 'substitute' for the saloon proper. There is no doubt at all that saloons will never be abolished until some substitute is found for them." In a few minutes after I read this in THE AMERICAN FRIEND I picked up the "Indianapolis News" of Eighth month 13th, and found an interview with Rev. Father Gavisk, of St. John's Catholic Church, in which he says: "The best method of dealing with intemperance is to do away with the saloon, and not give it Episcopal benediction." In the same article Rev. Nussing, Rabbi of the Indianapolis Hebrew Temple, is quoted as saying: "According to Jewish law drunkenness is a crime. He (the drunkard) stands in the same category as the gambler. Progressive Jews are certainly against places that are for drunkenness." The Right Rev. Joseph M. Francis, bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Indianapolis, is quoted as saying: "I deeply regret the action of Bishop Potter. I think he made a serious mistake. The saloon is an unmixed evil."

After reading these caustic criticisms by a Catholic priest, a Jewish Rabbi and a brother Episcopal bishop, how humiliated I felt to have my denominational paper, the organ of the Friends' Church in America, apologize for Bishop Potter's blasphemous doxology-benediction of a plain saloon, and go on to say with him: "They (the saloons) are at present the poor man's club," and insist it must not be taken from him until a substitute is put in its place.

Did we put a substitute in place of the Louisiana Lottery before we did away with it? Must we find a substitute for the gambling hell before it is crushed—and the Jew puts the gambler and drunkard in the same category—and so does our Supreme Court. Must we provide another occupation for the counterfeiter and horse-thief before we compel them to quit their present occupations?

For shame! And to come from a Quaker editor! My cheeks burn with humiliation and indignation!

Even the "Indianapolis News" editorially refutes the Potter and AMERICAN FRIEND plea that the saloon is the "poor man's club," and cites the fact that the many attempts to substitute the coffee house, reading room and gymnasium for the saloon have dismally failed for lack of patronage of the poor man; and declares the frequenter of the saloon goes there for the alcoholic stimulants he gets there, and nothing else.

But suppose it was the poor man's club. Does not the poor man keep it up and pay the bartender, and keep the saloon-keeper and his family, and furnish him a bank account besides after he has paid the wholesale liquor dealer and the United States Government at least six times the original cost of making the liquor? If it is not the liquor the poor man is after, why would it not be infinitely cheaper for him to furnish the club without the liquor, and why should the sober, industrious, non-drinking society, or the Government be called on to furnish a "substitute" for what the drinker is now furnishing at enormous cost? How can thinking men be so blinded to the plain duty of the people to blot out this infamy that so curses our nation and nullifies the work of the church.

Yes, the Bishop's Subway Tavern is a "modified saloon," as THE AMERICAN FRIEND editor says; so modified that it sells beer at the soda fountain to women and young girls—a thing no "unmodified" saloon does. "Soft drinks," indeed! But my humiliation overwhelms me.

P. S. In the name of humanity and for the sake of an outraged constituency in the Society of Friends in America, give space to the above in an early number of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

To the Society of Friends and all whom it may concern:

Greeting: In due consideration of the blessed admonition of the Royal Master, "Go ye into all the world and disciple all nations," "Lift up your eyes, for the harvest is already white," "Pray the Lord of the harvest that He may send forth laborers into the harvest," and various other burning commands, and further, what is far more effective than any decree whatever, the life, labors and sufferings of Himself, our beloved Jesus, in order to save mankind from the consequences of sin in the second death, we can, most beloved, no longer afford to tell the dear Master that we have believed every word of His, that the everlasting doom of the unsaved at home and abroad has been weighing heavy on us, that in His love we have partaken of His sufferings for the lost as He did without doing, not something, but all that is within the borders of the possibilities of faith and devotion, which limits were never marked.

I am far from charging the true people of God with all the different varieties of indifference toward the most holy cause, but it is my prayer that we, who sincerely mean Him only, should be made to see more and to realize deeper, first, the pacific salvation in the offering up of the only begotten Son of God; second, 2 Cor. 5: 10; third, the solemn truth as the sainted Charles Wesley framed it, "I have a charge to keep, a God to glorify, . . . and know if I betray my charge, I shall forever die."

Beloved, lest we should be found "wanting," let us raise the standard of Jesus Christ among every human family now. My plan is this:

Let a new society, perhaps under the name of "Order of the Standard Army" be organized, the object of which shall be the evangelization of the world, or rather an immediate taking possession of the nations for Jesus by the combined forces of the unceasing prayer and labors of the members of that society. Every meeting may select or upon request be given a tribe that is yet in whole or in part without the blessed tidings of the gospel. That meeting should regard such a tribe as a member of their family, bearing it on their heart and offer prayer and supplication for same in all their worship. The individual members and families of the different meetings having undertaken such a charge should regard it a blessed privilege to minister to the most imperative need of that particular tribe. If members of such meetings belonging to the Order of the Standard Army feel drawn in gospel love to go to another nation or tribe than their own, they shall be fully at liberty to do so, and nothing in the rules and regulations of the society shall be so constructed as to interfere with the work of other missions, provided they bear a gospel character. There should be on file at the headquarters of the Order the statistics of all the nations of the world, of the tribes in the nations and possibly the families in the tribes; also the approximate number of each; the language or dialect they speak; particulars about it, and the conditions and surroundings in general, whether there is a missionary among them, etc., etc. The nations and tribes as yet untouched by gospel missionaries should be taken hold of first. If the way is not open for action, we will pray it open. If it is open, we will continue in prayer for those at work, that God may pour out His Spirit upon that family or families, and all that are now being reached. If there are enough meetings that will thus lay hands on the nations, kindred, and tribes of the world, we might well now shout the joyful exclamation, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever." Amen.

Yours, in the love of the Saviour,

MATHIAS DENKHAUS.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Elwood O. Ellis is in a sanitarium at Oxford, Ohio.

Whittier Academy is located in Salem, Iowa, and not Salem, Ind., as stated in our Educational Number.

John M. Watson is spending the summer in New England. He is visiting meetings and Friends as way opens.

Melissa S. Fellow, the State organizer of the W. C. T. U. for Oklahoma, has organized twenty-six unions this year.

As Murray S. Kenworthy enters upon his work at Earlham College, Richard Haworth takes up the work in the meeting at Kokomo, Ind.

We are glad to hear that Albert J. Brown, president of Wilmington College, intends to be at the sessions of Iowa Yearly Meeting.

We have received from John Henry Douglas the report of the superintendent of Evangelistic and Church Extension Work of California Yearly Meeting. It is an interesting document.

Herman Newman expects to attend Iowa and Western Yearly Meetings with credentials from his monthly and quarterly meetings in Kansas. He is on the editorial staff of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

Friends from a distance desiring board and lodging during Iowa Yearly Meeting should send their names to Rebecca G. Lewis, chairman Entertainment Committee, 421 North Market Street, Oskaloosa, Iowa.

Friends of Iowa Monthly Meeting, Okla., held a Bible School Conference at Valley Queen, the 20th ult. All schools in the meeting were represented. Some manifested great enthusiasm. It was felt to be a time of awakening and instructing.

R. Hayes Puckett, who has so satisfactorily served the meeting at Bangor, Iowa, as pastor the past two years, will remain another year. His sermons from time to time are encouraging and a strength to all. In Fourth month last arrangements were made for the erection of a two-story house for his use, which is near completion.

The twentieth school year of Hesper Academy, Eudora, Kan., opens this month. Susan Dow and her sister Mary, from Massachusetts, are the teachers. They come well recommended. The school has been a blessing to the Friends' meeting and the community. The Sabbath School and Christian Endeavor are kept up with good interest and good attendance. Rachel C. Woodard is serving as pastor.

Ministers of other yearly meetings with credentials for service at Indiana Yearly Meeting are requested to promptly inform Timothy Nicholson, Richmond, Ind., in order that suitable homes may be provided for them. When practicable they will please inform what their address will be on Ninth month 20th, that they may learn by mail the street and number to which they have been assigned.

Bloomington Quarterly Meeting, Ind., was held the 20th and 21st ult. Elbert Russell, of Earlham College, was present and gave much good counsel. He delivered two lectures and preached two sermons, and left First-day afternoon for Wilmington Yearly Meeting. The statistical report showed a membership this year of 1,104. The Academy will be in charge of Prof. A. F. Mitchell and assistants.

The following from the Jamaican Mission appeared in "Western Work": "The statistics for the church year ending Sixth month 30th, show an enrollment of members as follows: Sea Side, 247 adults and 102 associate members; Amity Hall, 151 adults and 33 associate members; Glen Haven, a total of 101; St. Elizabeth, 17 adults and 6 Juniors. The entire membership is 657, with a net gain over last year of 96. Many of those who have come into the church the past year decided for Christ soon after the hurricane."

This has been a year of unusual blessing to the Friends at Marshalltown, Iowa. Although Wm. Pilot, the pastor, was in college several months of the time, the work has moved on aggressively. Souls have been saved, a mission established, and the Endeavor Society has more than doubled its membership. The spiritual life of the church has been deepened, and many have been taken into membership.

A member of the Society of Friends in London, employed by a firm which makes stereopticon views, recently made a series of views of the Vatican. They so much pleased the Pope that he sent a copy of the reproduction of the portrait of himself with the following message in his own handwriting: "To Signor E. R. Ross, in token of true gratitude, and with the prayer that the peace of Jesus Christ may everywhere prevail, by the observance of His Divine Law, whereby alone can that happiness be attained which is the desire of all."

The Friends of Alva, Okla., have held services in eight different houses the past three years, and are gathering in lost souls from the byways and prairies. They are now greatly in need of a permanent place of worship. They recently purchased a lot and are collecting money with which to build. John and Margaret Jenkins and Henry and Melissa Fellow are spending time and means to build up a meeting there. The principles of Friends are generally received with favor by the people. They ask for the prayers of God's children everywhere.

Greenfield Meeting of Friends has secured the services of Thomas C. Williams, of Amboy, Ind., as their pastor the coming year. He comes to the meeting highly recommended, and the meeting feels that it has been very fortunate in securing him. Daisy B. Barr, the present pastor, has entered a new field of service as secretary and field worker in the Indiana Yearly Meeting Christian Endeavor. Greenfield Friends have only warm words of commendation for her services. In the two years of her ministry she has been instrumental by her energy and devotion to the work of bringing the meeting up to a prominence in the community which it never enjoyed before.

Salem Quarterly Meeting, held at Lynn, Mass., the 17th and 18th ult., was a reproduction—somewhat in miniature—of yearly meeting, many of the yearly meeting committees making it the occasion for meeting in the interests of their respective works. John M. Watson, of Indian Territory, and Albert Bailey, of Kansas, were acceptably present. Alfred T. Ware, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, and Charles M. Woodman, who shortly enters upon pastoral labor at Portland, Maine, both gave gospel messages on Fifth-day morning, which were direct and powerful. New England Yearly Meeting is fortunate in having the service of these gifted and devoted young men.

The many friends of Lydia M. Chase will be glad to know that she is slowly recovering from the severe prostration under which she has suffered for the past four months, and there now seems a prospect that she will in time regain at least a measure of her usual health, for which she expresses many thanks to the Heavenly Father. Her friends believed she might derive much benefit from country air, and she is now in the home of her daughter, Phebe M. Barnard, in Cherokee County, Kansas. Notwithstanding great physical weakness, she is able occasionally to attend meeting, where her presence and counsel are highly appreciated by Friends. Her address is Galena, Kansas, R. F. D. No. 1.

Here is something which ought to be taken up by Friends everywhere. This is a copy of a resolution of a Congregational Church in Omaha:

"Resolved, By this union meeting of Christian citizens of Omaha that, having heard the Associated Press report of the proposed opium law for the Philippines, published August 6th, we earnestly petition President Roosevelt to prevent the dishonor of a Christian nation falling below a heathen nation, by decreeing, through executive order, that Japan's law on opium, or one as strict, shall be the law of the Philippines. And we urge all Christian and human Americans to join us at once in this appeal, by telegrams, letters and voted petitions of missionary and other boards and societies."

Newberg Quarterly Meeting was held at Newberg, Oregon, the 12th to 14th ult. Although the attendance was unusually small, it was a time of blessing to those present. John Henry Douglas was in attendance, and his preaching was a blessing to the hearers. H. Edwin McGrew returned the minute granted him one year ago to attend some of the Eastern yearly meetings and do gospel service within their limits. The congregation was much interested in hearing his account of his visit to Iowa, Western and Baltimore Yearly Meetings; of his visit to Toronto, Canada, and Black Creek, Virginia; and of his sojourn in Philadelphia. Martin Cook was granted a minute by Newberg Monthly Meeting to visit the meeting recently established at Everett, Wash. This minute was endorsed by the quarterly meeting, and great interest was felt in his concern and the proposed visit. A memorial leaflet of the life and death of Margaretta Thorne, a minister, and her daughter Mary, isolated members of our church, was read during the business session of the quarterly meeting. Words of highest appreciation were expressed concerning the consecrated life and service of Margaretta Thorne. Her great loyalty to the church during years of separation from it was also noted. There was a desire on the part of many hearing the leaflet that their lives might also be filled with true righteousness.

The "London Friend" gives this interesting account of the first Friends' meeting in Johannesburg:

"Although there are a few Friends in Johannesburg, no attempt had been made up to last Sunday to hold a regular meeting for worship here. But as, owing to the missionary conference now being held, several Friends were in town, we thought it would be helpful to have such a meeting, even though it might not be possible to follow it. Invitations were sent to the few local Friends, and the meeting was announced in the daily papers. The South Africa General Mission kindly allowed the use of their hall for the occasion.

"There was an attendance of twenty. Of these, one-half were missionaries, and the other half were people who, though not actually Friends, had mostly been in the habit of attending Friends' meetings in the old country. One of these told me that he had been for twenty-three years an attender at Bunhill Meeting, and a member of Class B of the adult school there. Others spoke of their pleasure at being again at a meeting for worship. The Friends present who are missionaries in South Africa were Elbert Clarke, of Natal; Mr. and Mrs. Coates, of Swaziland; Mrs. Hamilton (nee Jackson, of Belfast), of Pondoland, and Miss Frances Taylor. Two other missionaries who were with us have decided to apply for membership with Friends. The meeting was felt to be a favored time. It is the first public meeting of Friends, I understand, that has been held in the Transvaal.

"Others would have been present had it not been that the venerable Dr. Stewart, of Lovedale, was preaching in the town.

Events and Comments.

To commemorate the christening of his son, the Czarevitch Alexis Nicholae-vitch, Czar Nicholas II. last week issued a manifesto, bestowing various benefits upon the Russian people. The one of greatest significance is the entire abolition of corporal punishment among the rural classes and its curtailment in the army and navy. The other reforms relate to special classes, especially to Jews and Finns.

Active work on the Panama Canal is about to begin in earnest. At the headquarters of the Commission in Washington large requisitions from the isthmus for dynamite and powder for blasting purposes are being filled. To meet the demand for the considerable amount of printing required in connection with the enterprise a full printing outfit has been authorized, and this will go forward at the earliest possible moment.

"A TOOTHsome FLAVOR."

True for you, there's a treat in the crisp, nutty, delicate sweet taste of Grape-Nuts served with thick rich cream. (Don't spoil the food by trying to cook it. That work is done and perfectly done at the factories.)

The cream should soften it a bit, but not enough to excuse the eater from at least a few good earnest "chews," for old Dame Nature sends rich blessings to the long chewer. Of course, the one with weak teeth can soften the food with milk down to a mush if necessary, but the good Old Dame doesn't smile quite so cheerfully on them.

You know children and adults must use the teeth and grind freely to make them grow strong and to preserve them. Then the act of chewing brings down the much-needed saliva from the gums, and that helps amazingly in the digestion of foods of various kinds.

The saliva is not so much required with Grape-Nuts, for this food is pre-digested; that is, the starch turned into a form of sugar in the process of making, and that helps give it the fascinating flavor.

Grape-Nuts people are healthy and enjoy good things. "There's a reason."

railway across the Pyrenees was signed at Paris this week. It provides for their completion within three years. It is anticipated that the new lines will greatly increase the friendly relations and commerce between the two countries, and that they will also constitute an important step toward the spread of French influence in Morocco, communication with which will be much quickened and facilitated.

Superintendent Homer Williams, of the Duquesne Steel Works, at Pittsburg, Pa., an old Carnegie steel man, has perfected a process which will mean a revolution in the manufacture of steel and will put millions of dollars into the coffers of the company. He has succeeded, after many experiments, in reducing the phosphorus in the molten iron while still in the ladle, thus making it ready for the Bessemer converter to be made into steel. The process is simple and costs no more than the ordinary way of handling steel.

The falling away of patronage from the West at New England colleges is emphasized in the statistics of entrance examinations held this year under the direction of the college entrance examination board. Fewer students every year reach these institutions from the country beyond the Allegheny Mountains, a fact that reveals the growing competition of the stronger Western institutions. The patronage at the New England colleges, however, steadily grows because the East sends more boys and girls to them than ever before. The number of candidates for admission from New England was 30 per cent., and in the Middle States 21 per cent. larger than last year. Much of this increase is probably due to the great pressure upon the women's colleges, which in this part of the country are unable to receive all the young women who wish to enter them.

The United States Government has again formally proposed to Russia the opening of negotiations for the unrestricted recognition of American passports. In accordance with the law of the Empire, only foreign Jews of specified classes are allowed to enter Russia, but quite a liberal policy has been pursued in making exceptions to the rule. The exceptions, however, are seldom made in the case of Russian Jews who have been naturalized abroad. The inhibition is not against the United States alone, but extends to the Jews of every country. The United States Government, on several occasions, especially while James G. Blaine was Secretary of State, sought to open negotiations regarding this question, but the Russian Government always declined to begin such negotiations, on the ground that the question involved the entire readjustment of the internal policy of the Empire toward the Jews. The more liberal policy recently manifested toward the Jews of Russia seems to create at least the room for hope that Ambassador McCormick may now succeed where his predecessors failed.

The English administration in Egypt, under the direction of Lord Cromer, has matured a scheme for opening up and developing that country, involving the expenditure of more than one hundred millions of dollars, of which about sixty-five will be used in the development of the Soudan and the balance in the development of Egypt. The plan involves the utilization of the White Nile for the irrigation of Egypt and of the Blue Nile for the irrigation of the Soudan. This important proposal is coincident with the statement that Germany, Austria, Italy and Russia have assented to the recent agreement between Great Britain and France touching Egyptian affairs, and are to give Great Britain a free hand in dealing with that country, in return for which they are to receive the privilege of unrestricted commerce for a period of thirty years. This is, in effect, a formal acceptance of the English occupation of Egypt, and not only removes one of the causes of irritation between France and England, but secures international consent to the continuance of the practical rights of sovereignty which England has exercised over that country for nearly thirty years.

BEIN' SICK.

When I am really sick abed

It isn't ever any fun.

I feel all achy in my head

An' hate, to take my medisun.

Th' sheets get stickyish an' hot,

But I am not allowed to kick

'Em off, er read, er talk a lot

When I am sick.

I hate for all the folks about

To come an' pat me on th' face

An' say, "Poor child, you'll soon be out,"

An' tiptoe all around th' place.

They go when I pretend to be Asleep—I do it for a trick;

I don't like folks to pity me

When I am sick.

My mother's diff'runt—I don't care

If she sits by me once er twice

An' says, "Poor boy," an' smooths my hair;

She ain't just tryin' to be nice.

They bring warm squishy things to me

For meals, an' make me eat 'em quick.

I'm mis'ruble as I can be

When I am sick.

Those who have consistently and bravely preached the optimistic doctrine that in the natural laws of commercial and industrial competition were to be found the surest remedy—belated, perhaps, but nevertheless inevitable—for the evils of combination, will find comfort in the conditions which culminated recently in the steel trade in this country and in the transatlantic passenger rate situation. The United States Steel Company has dissolved all pools, except that on rails, making the market for iron and steel an open one. A reduction of $4.00 per ton on wire nails, $5.00 per ton

LEARNING THINGS.

We Are All in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness, the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill., says: "After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of. I could get no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve medicines I tried because I didn't know that the coffee was daily putting me back more than the doctors could put me ahead.

"Finally, at the request of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum, and against my convictions I gradually improved in health, until for the past six or eight months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood, and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a re-builder. That's the reason.

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

(Grace Church Chimes)

*The day has dimmed to dusk, and Sleep and Rest
Have summoned busy Traffic to her bed;
The slumber-star gleams brightly overhead,
And little children seek the mother-breast.
Now softly on the stilly air is pressed
The lip of Music, pure, with peace o'erspread,
That falls like benediction angel-shed,
Or seraph-voice to earth made manifest.*

*"Lead, kindly Light," and now "He leadeth me,"—
The darkness seems illumined by the strain—
"Hark, hark," and "Lord, forever at thy side";
How tenderly is voiced each vesper plea!
Dear "Rock of Ages" and that sweet refrain, "Abide with me! Fast falls the eventide."*

THE EDITOR'S BRAIN

Did Not Work Well Under Coffee.

A brain worker's health is often injured by coffee, badly selected food and sedentary habits. The experience of the managing editor of one of the most prosperous newspapers in the Middle West, with Postum Food Coffee illustrates the necessity of proper feeding for the man who depends on his brain for a living.

"Up to three years ago," writes this gentleman, "I was a heavy coffee drinker. I knew it was injuring me. It directly affected my stomach, and I was threatened with chronic dyspepsia. It was then that my wife persuaded me to try Postum Food Coffee. The good results were so marked that I cannot say too much for it. When first prepared I did not fancy it, but inquiry developed the fact that cook had not boiled it long enough, so next time I had it properly made and was charmed with it. Since that time coffee has had no place on my table save for guests. Both myself and wife are fond of this new cup which 'cheers but does not inebriate' in a much truer and fitter sense than coffee. My stomach has resumed its normal functions, and I am now well and strong again mentally and physically.

"I am confident that coffee is a poison to many stomachs, and I have recommended Postum with great success to a number of my friends who were suffering from the use of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Superintendent Brownson, of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., has protested against the granting of saloon licenses in the vicinity of the Academy.

The United States Government entomologists, who were conducting the experiments with the Guatemala ants which were brought to Texas several weeks ago for the purpose of propagating them in the belief that they would destroy the cotton boll weevil pest, are mystified as to what has become of them. The colonies have suddenly disappeared, and there is no clue as to their fate. It is not known whether the ants have died or are hibernating or have migrated.

The Dominion of Canada is just now receiving a double benefit from immigration. There is a large stream of American immigrants seeking homes there, and the immigration from the British Isles, which formerly skipped Canada for the most part and settled in this country, is to some extent reversing the operation. In 1903 Canada received 40,473 American immigrants, against 8,543 in 1900. It received 41,792 British immigrants in the same year, against 5,142 in 1900. Meanwhile the Canadian immigration to the United States has become inconsiderable.

Harvard's recent acquisition, for her astronomical observatory, of the largest efficient telescope in the world is an interesting event. Some authorities contended that the limit of size had been reached in the construction of equatorially mounted telescopes when the great 40-inch Yerkes lens of the University of Chicago was constructed, but Harvard now has an instrument with a 60-inch reflector. This widens the facilities of the institution for original scientific research, and adds one more notable piece of apparatus to the splendid equipment in the hands of American astronomers.

The infection with typhoid germs of the water taken from the Potomac into the reservoirs that supply Washington has led to the determination on the part of the District of Columbia authorities to make use of the remedy discovered by Dr. George T. Moore and Karl F. Kellerman, bacteriologists of the Department of Agriculture, for the destruction of algae and disease germs in water by the copper sulphate solution. Since the announcement six months ago of the discovery, it has been used with success in several large cities, among them being Indianapolis, Butte, Mont.; Springfield, Mass., and Baltimore. In every place where it was tried the copper solution was an instant success. The cost for the copper sulphate destruction of bacteria will be from $5 to $6 per million gallons, and where lime or some soluble hydrate is used in addition the cost would be increased about one-third. The cost of labor necessary to introduce these substances will be slight, since two men can usually treat from 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 gallons in less than three hours. It is likewise certain that after standing from six to eight hours at room temperature in a clean copper vessel water becomes safe to drink even though it may have contained cholera and typhoid germs. It remains to be seen whether or not the application of these facts to conditions in the tropics, where cholera is abundant, will be of any value.

Too many religious festivals have long been a difficulty in Russia's industrial life. Anything like consecutive labor or habits of industry was well-nigh impossible. Now all this has been changed. A sweeping edict has been issued by the Imperial Council and approved by the Czar to the effect that absolute freedom is accorded to work on Sundays, saints' days and during the celebration of religious ceremonies; no authority is accorded to any one who would put an obstacle in the way of those who decline to refrain from work. Order is given to cancel all penalties already incurred by persons who have worked upon holidays. At first sight this would seem to be a stunning blow at the observance of the Sabbath. As a matter of fact, it is an indirect method of securing six days of labor and one of rest. The Sabbath was necessarily included in the edict, as it is now considered less sacred by the Greek Church than some saints' days.

Faith can remove mountains, no doubt of it; but it is the faith that takes off its coat and digs.

IS GOD TENDER-HEARTED ?

IN A FAR-AWAY country village lives a dear old saint who has had many rich experiences in the heavenly life here on earth. It is a most touching sight to see her eyes fill with tears and most affecting to hear her voice tremble with emotion, whenever she repeats the words, "His tender mercies are over all his works." The words open her deepest floodgates because she knows that they are true. The "tenderness" has become as real to her as the blueness of the sky is real to the rest of us.

But multitudes of good people lack this faith of hers. They have lost it through some terrible experience which tore down into the very bed-rock of their lives. Reports are coming in to the effect that one of the most distressing effects of the burning of the "General Slocum" in New York harbor is the collapse of faith on the part of many of the survivors. The steamer was loaded with the members of a church. They were God-fearing people, full of love and reverence and well settled in the Christian faith. Suddenly they were enveloped in flames, and the few survivors found themselves left often alone out of an entire family—the rest had perished in the fire or in the sea. How could a God who would permit a catastrophe like that—to persons who were serving Him—be good, not to say tender? This is the question which these perplexed people have asked again and again, and to which they have found no satisfying answer. They are not alone in their questioning. By vacant chairs and deserted hearthstones all over the world mute lips ask the same question, and the loss is all the harder to bear because the shock has made God seem distant and unloving.

This surely is a wrong way to think of God. He does not inflict these catastrophes and He could not prevent them without throwing the universe into a chaos of lawlessness. We could not live in the world at all if it were not for the mighty forces which are so destructive when we get careless in handling them. The laws of fire and steam and electricity and gravitation must be unvarying if they are to be beneficial to man. They are full of blessing to us, until some day we fail to co-operate with them, and then their inexorableness crushes us.

Does that mean that God forgot to be kind or tender? He would rather be unkind if He changed His laws every time one of us grew careless with them. The universe is stern. It would not be a good universe if it were not. It is just because it has been stern and unyielding that we have slowly learned how to conquer it for our purposes. We should have made no progress if it had varied every time we ran up against any of its hard facts.

Some noble man is snatched away by typhoid fever and we hear many question how Divine Providence could have removed such a valuable man. God does not have one system of laws for a valuable man and another system for the tramp. The laws of typhoid germs are unvarying. He expects us to learn them. There ought not to be any polluted water. We cannot ask Him to excuse our negligence and to hold up the natural course of things just this once. We have at last learned the secret of typhoid because its laws were unvarying, and some day there will be none in the world, because we have learned to conquer it.

God is kind and tender, but that makes it necessary for the order of the universe to be stern. There can be no advance, no moral or spiritual discipline in any other kind of a world. We all play more or less with "edged-tools," and no wonder that sometimes they cut, but it does not show that He who made the mighty instruments for our service was therefore unloving.

It is true, however, that we should never have discovered how much God loved the world if we had had only nature and experience to go to. He who wants comfort, he who seeks the oil of joy for mourning, does not go to the beneficent and unvarying forces of nature to find it. They are too impersonal. He goes to "the God and Father of Jesus Christ." He feels his way to the bosom of infinite tenderness and love which the Son of God revealed. No sparrow falls without His care, no mourner weeps without His sympathy, no wanderer says, "I will go to my Father," without bringing joy to His heart. Nature shows that He is not unkind. Christ shows that He is plenteous in mercy and a tender Father to all His children.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

THE last issue of "Friends' Quarterly Examiner" contains a valuable set of articles on the question: "Why Friends do not Increase in Membership." Six of the articles are by well known English Friends, and two are by men not in membership with us. The writers naturally deal with English rather than with American situations, but some of the views have as much bearing here as there. Many writers attribute the failure to increase to a lack of aggressiveness, and the contrast is drawn between the passive attitude of to-day and the "over-aggressiveness" of primitive Quakerism. One Friend thinks we have failed to advance because we lacked leadership. He says: "The want of leadership is a constant source of weakness. The Society of Friends has, in these latter days, persistently turned its back on all the experience of the Christian Church, the Jewish synagogue, and of all organized effort amongst men for the promotion of great causes. It has substituted for the natural leadership of men whom God has gifted with an influence over their fellows, government by committee, and in so doing has paralyzed the spiritual work of the Church."

The trouble, again, is attributed to the weakness of the ministry, the lack of a positive message, too much "introspective" preaching which has no wide relation to general human needs, too many sermons in which the truth to be presented is wrapped up and fairly lost in a mass of words. Another comments on the failure to bring the evangelizing agencies into vital connection with the Church itself. One of the writers who is not a Friend speaks of the need of meetings in "which the whole service throbs with reality and spiritual passion." That is the secret. Another calls for "consecrated audacity," which is also a good thing.

ALL our readers should be interested in the two great Peace events of this autumn. On the 12th, 13th and 14th of the present month will occur the twelfth meeting of the Interparliamentary Peace Union at St. Louis—the first to be held in the United States. Our government has appropriated $50,000 to help defray the expenses of this important meeting. Three weeks later the great International Peace Congress will gather in the city of Boston, Tenth month 3d to 7th. This will probably be the most imposing assembly which has ever gathered to promote the cause of the world's Peace. Many distinguished men and women are coming from Europe to attend it and to take part in the discussions. Robert Treat Paine, president of the American Peace Society, will preside. A number of the judges of The Hague Court will be among the speakers. Albert K. Smiley, Benjamin F. Trueblood, Hannah J. Bailey and other well known Friends will be members and participators in the Congress. New England Yearly Meeting is sending seven delegates to it, and doubtless other yearly meetings will be represented.

FRIENDS will be pleased to have their minds revert to Harriet Green and her great work among American Friends. The fund being raised in her memory to establish a department at Guilford College to promote the study of the Bible among the students has reached nearly seven thousand dollars. A few days ago Laura O. Ward, of Winchester, Indiana, sent fifty dollars, and Himelius M. Hockett, of Centre, N. C., contributed two and one-half dollars. It is hoped that many more Friends will contribute to this fund in the near future, and help bring the sum up to an amount that will support the department of instruction which Harriet Green wished to see established at Guilford College.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

OUR FATHER.

BY EDWARD JUDSON.

What a comfort in the words! Man and God united in such a close relation! Words found in no other religion than ours! I do not wonder that in hours of loneliness and despair Thomas Carlyle used to see these words inscribed in luminous letters on the black bosom of night! The thought in them recurs so often in Scriptures and in the symbols of the Holy Church Universal!

The Lord is my Shepherd.

Our Father which art in Heaven.

God is love.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and earth.

O God, the Father of Heaven; have mercy upon us miserable sinners.

God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable, in His being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth.

The Father in Heaven cannot, indeed, be mathematically demonstrated. The truth is too vast to be girded by any system of human logic. It cannot be established in such a way that doubt would be impossible to a sane mind. The probability of it, however, can be established, and by acting upon that probability we arrive at certitude.

"We have but faith; we cannot know,
For knowledge is of things we see;
And yet we trust it comes from Thee,
A beam in darkness, let it grow."

This great truth of the Fatherhood of God is a kind of rational intuition. Like an axiom in geometry, it only needs to be stated to be accepted.

If our conduct is such that the vision of God is an intrusion and a menace, it is easy for us to shut Him out of all our thoughts.

The argument for God is made up of various strands of evidence. It is not a chain the strength of which depends upon the integrity of each individual link. It is more like a rope composed of numerous fibers, some of which may part, without fatal detriment to the rope.

The idea of God meets the requirements of our intellectual nature. We keep going back in our thought toward the final cause of the universe, and we find rest only in the conclusion that mind is the final cause and not matter. This is one of the strands in our rope.

We see traces of design in nature. We stumble upon purposeful collocations—arrangements adapted to the achievement of certain ends, and like one picks up a flint arrow-head, we become aware of mind in the Universe other than ours. This is another strand in the rope of probability. One cannot conceive that a watch with all its intricate mechanism made itself, or according to Martineau's illustration, as quoted by Augustus H. Strong, that patterned damask was made not by the weaver, but by the loom, or as Joseph Cook puts it, that books were written by the laws of spelling and grammar.

Again the thought of God meets the requirements of our spiritual nature. Our moral strivings and the instinct for worship, which is universally prevalent among men, find their correlative and counterpart in God. "The desire of the moth for the star" makes probable the existence of the star. This is far from a mathematical demonstration of God, but it is only one of the many strands which, twisted together, compose a strong rope of probability.

But a consideration of our own individual insignificance sometimes makes it difficult for us to believe in the Fatherhood of God. Can it be, we ask, that in this vast universe He searches out with His loving care each minute human life, as a mother-bird penetrates the privacy formed by the branches of some great tree and unerringly finds her way to the wide-mouthed nestlings? When we stand upon some country road at night and look out upon the starry space and consider that each glistening speck of dust in the milky way is a world, and that our earth, "home of the struggling, suffering, doubting, dying," is only a single grain of sand on a measureless seashore, how infinitesimal seems each human life that makes its home on this grain of sand among countless other lives which have been and are and will be! Can it be that God cares for the individual soul? When visited by such misgivings I find relief in this thought, that the being, no matter how minute he is, that can grasp his thought—the starry heavens, and can measure the distance from star to star—is greater than the whole material universe besides. "Man is a reed," says Paschal, "and the weakest in nature, but he is a reed that thinks." The brain of an ant is but a tiny atom of grey matter, but it possesses a kind of distinction, because it is the home of thought. While looking at photographs of vast Egyptian architecture—sphinxes, pyramids and temples—we sometimes lower our eyes to gaze at the forms of men standing on the sand below. How diminutive their human figures seem as compared with the huge structures that tower above them. They seem introduced as a kind of foil, so that the height of the solid masonry shall be enhanced. But, after all, the man who can erect such structures is greater than they. A being made in the image of God is worthy of His regard. Clay suffused with personality and consciousness transcends the whole material universe with all its inert grandeur. We may well believe that as the ocean girdles the continents and at the same time swathes in its soft embrace the tiniest sprig of sea weed, moistening it in every part, so the regard of our Heavenly Father presses against each individual soul gently and evenly on every side, penetrating to every hidden frailty and need.

New York City.

A TRUE MINISTER A MAN OF HIS TIME.

BY JOHN M. ENGLISH.

In the deepest meaning all times are alike, since truth and human nature are fundamentally the same the world over and the centuries through. And it is significantly true that one time differs from another time, from all other times. There is such a thing as the Time-spirit.

How entirely different was the first Christian century from the fifth century before Christ and the fifth century after Christ. How much is there in common between the eighteenth century and the twentieth century? Many of its forces, especially the material ones, are very recent. If a man could step into our day from so near a period as the opening of the nineteenth century, he would be bewildered, stunned by the brilliant marvels that have been wrought through the application of steam and of electricity, and by our colossal commercial enterprises. What would he think of our way of looking at nature, at man and at God? He would surely exclaim: "The old order changes. Behold, all things are become new." If you are to be true ministers its thinking, its activities, its interests, its point of view, its temper—that subtle something impossible to define, but profoundly felt, which makes an age what it is.

You are to become acquainted with your time not from books alone. You must learn your time by studying it, by living in it, by becoming a part of it, by giving your heart to it. You are to esteem it as unutterably precious, as, on the whole, the best time God has given to His world—a time that offers you a supreme opportunity. This is essential to your having a message. For the Christian minister who is out of sympathy with his own generation, and who bemoans the passing of the former days and the coming of the new days has no heart to receive or to deliver a message.

What will you find to be true of your time that profoundly concerns you as ministers of the gospel? You will certainly find that the forces which essentially constitute it are varied, complex, tangled. There are so many currents and undercurrents and cross-currents in it that often you may feel baffled and in despair in any attempt to get a deep, true insight into it. Our time is in many ways paradoxical.

Three or four characteristics of our time will impress you. I can do no more than barely name them.

Men are in love with things. Our age is an age of things. Our civilization is largely a material civilization. It often seems as if men more highly esteem what they do and what they have than what they are. The inventor is in danger of loving his invention, the author of loving his book, the artist of loving his picture, and the merchant of loving his goods better than they love themselves. Men are sorely tempted to live outside of their real selves as never before. For never before was the world so rich in things to make life comfortable, luxurious, fascinating. We are strongly prone to estimate men in the terms of their accumulations. How much is he worth? is too often the inquiry which is made the measure of a man's success in life.

Alongside of this love of things is a love of reality. Men insist upon reality now. They care little for mere office and position. They have no patience with pretense and sham. They want, and they will have the real thing, whatever it is. They certainly demand this of the minister of the gospel. They require that he shall be what he seems to be and shall give the core of what he has to give. They may not believe what he says, but they insist that he shall believe it and that he shall say it because he believes it. The whole trend of modern thought and investigation has been in the direction of reality. Even truth must be stripped bare and stand forth for just what it is. And this is wholly favorable to the Christian ministry. For it is a ministry of reality. It has nothing to conceal. It is profoundly true now as Jesus said, "What I tell you in the darkness, speak ye in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, proclaim upon the house-tops." Ultimately there are no secrets in the kingdom of God.

Another mark of our time is, broadly speaking, a return to faith. Love of reality, which is love of truth, has had much to do with bringing this about. Men now believe in the great mental and spiritual verities as men half a century ago did not. Then the sceptical spirit in connection with the new, the sudden, the revolutionary development of physical science, almost swept men off their feet. They wondered if there was anything except and beyond physical force. Since then they have come to themselves, and they are more and more believing that there is a force back of physical force, and that there is a spiritual entity in man. The philosophical studies, as over against the scientific studies, are coming to their rights again. God and man, and not merely nature, are swinging afresh into the horizon of man's thought, and feeling, and purpose to-day. This is highly favorable for you and your ministry. There is something to preach, and something in man to preach to.

There is in our time a shifting of emphasis concerning the relation between God and man. The logical understanding does not relatively occupy the place it once did in finding out God and in defending His ways with men. The syllogism, as an instrument of truth, is not as prominent or as potent as it once was. Ever since the remarkable conversion of Professor Romanes, thoughtful men are putting increase of stress upon the fact that God appeals not to the human intellect alone, but to the entire man, and that man responds to God, not out of his mind merely, but out of his whole moral personality. Our knowledge of God and of His gracious ways is grasped by the sum total of our mental and moral selves. And God satisfies the whole man. He presents the witness for Himself in all that man is, and gives the unspeakable joy of His salvation and fellowship with Him in a precious experience vouchsafed unto every part of the human spirit. We react on God's saving manifestation of Himself to us out of our thought and feeling and conscience and will, and out of these working together in a single, undivided personality. This is the best of good news to the minister of Christ. How can he be grateful enough for it, and deeply enough rejoice in it? Man is made for God, and when God speaks man can answer. He may smother his response to God, as he often does. He may try to put something else in the place of God. But he is essentially on God's side, as God is on his. Know that. Act on that. And sooner or later your ministry must be fruitful. If you would be true ministers, know your time. That is the first thing. The second is,

YOU MUST MINISTER TO YOUR TIME.

As you are to get your message from the Bible, an antique, but not an antiquated book, you will be in some danger of seeming to speak to the times that gave us the Bible, of lingering unduly in its ancient atmosphere, and of having its local color too prominent in your preaching. Do not preach to the renegade Jews of the Old Testament who killed the prophets, or to those of the New Testament who put our Saviour to death, as though they were still with us and in need of a ministry. Do not aim your message at the sinful people in the churches of Corinth and Rome. They are all dead and gone. Do not minister to the men of other generations and of other lands. A temptation lurks here stronger and more subtle than you now may think. It is easier to face another generation than to face your own; to condemn the sins of other times than those of the present time. Indeed, there is a certain antiquated flavor in some really sound preaching which makes the impression that it is adapted and intended for almost any other time than our own. Search out the abiding, the living truth of the Scriptures and preach it directly, faithfully, lovingly to the tempted, struggling men before you. Speak to their deepest convictions, to their noblest impulses, to their central spiritual needs, and you will get a response. For, after all, it is a time of men as well as of things. Preach God. There is a deep sense in which it is true that God is becoming an unknown idea to many in our generation. Men are growing used to getting along without God, so full are their lives of temporal good. They simply neglect Him. The surface of their natures is satisfied by the things that fill their sense-life. This keeps them from noting the hunger of their deeper selves. But it is there and cannot be destroyed. It is ingrained in man's make. As Jesus, on His higher plane, unveiled the Father to His generation, so are you, on your lower plane, to unveil the Father to yours. For did not Jesus say, "As thou didst send me into the world, even so sent I them into the world, and the glory thou hast given me I have given unto them?" Know God yourselves; know Him intimately, affectionately, obediently; then try hard to make the men of your time know Him. Lead them to see how holy, loving, beautiful, fascinating a being God is, that in Him they live, move and are; that He is more indispensable to their inner, spiritual life than breathing is to their outer, physical life. Make God in His varied manifestations the center and heart of your ministries, and men must hear your call, for ultimately He is their only good. Abide in the vision of God; then keep declaring your vision to the men of your time, and as God is God and man is man, there will be those who will receive it, live in it, and bless you for it. Thus will you serve the present age and your calling fulfill.—"The Watchman."

COLORADO AS A FIELD FOR FRIENDS.*

BY M. Z. KIRK.

There are two questions in this paper to be decided. Do Friends need Colorado, and does Colorado need Friends? There are perhaps but few Friends' families in Colorado who cannot answer the first question in the affirmative. We have come to Colorado for the benefit of the health of some member of the family.

A great many families have been compelled to leave prosperous but damp and lower altitudes of the East and come to the Rocky Mountain districts for various pulmonary difficulties. To those who have been here a few years it is easy to recall many painful sights. We have seen the father or mother, brother or sister, son or daughter, fleeing from the East to the high, dry climate of Colorado. In many cases it has been almost a hopeless race. Too often they have waited until the dreaded white plague has crushed out almost the last spark of vitality. Time and again we have seen our friends and our relatives come to this climate when there was but little hope for recovery. Too often it has been delayed until it was a useless trip. On the other hand, it has been a source of great pleasure to the one stricken with this dreaded disease, as well as to all of his friends, to see him gradually improve from week to week and from month to month, and finally recover his normal health.

But few of us realize the importance of health until it is too late. In a circular just issued by the State Board of Health of Illinois, entitled "The Cause and Prevention of Consumption," it is shown that in Illinois the disease is responsible for more deaths than typhoid fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria, all forms of bronchitis, influenza, measles and small-pox combined. It is further found that those dying from consumption were usually in the prime of life. Of the 7,000 persons who died from this disease in Illinois in 1903, half of them were between the ages of 20 and 50, while the estimated loss each year to the State because of the disease is about $36,000,000.

Perhaps every one present to-day can point to scores of cases which have been materially benefited by the pure and dry air of our State, whose lives have been prolonged for many years. We cannot but hope that the day will soon come when the medical profession will understand more thoroughly this terrible disease and will urge all patients to seek such a climate as Colorado before it is too late.

With the private and charitable sanitariums, which have been erected for these poor sufferers, there is no reason why people of even moderate means cannot get the very best service for the prevention and cure of this disease.

It is needless to state that the Oakes Home is one of the best equipped institutions of its kind in the world. To the list of institutions doing good in this line might be added the many small private concerns, as well as the Sanitarium at Boulder and the new Agnes Sanitarium at Montclair, which is being erected by the philanthropist, Lawrence Phipps, and the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives. The Oakes Home furnishes every luxury the better classes can ask at a nominal charge.

The Agnes Sanitarium is being erected especially for the benefit of the middle and working classes. It is endowed to such an extent that it can give the best service at about a dollar a day. A friend once said to me that it was not absolutely necessary to be poor to gain admission to this institution, but that the rich could get no better service here than those of moderate means. This institution will, no doubt, bring joy and happiness and health to thousands and hundreds of thousands of sufferers who might have gone down to an early grave.

The National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives is strictly a charitable institution in every sense of the word. If the patient is admitted to this institution at all, he or she is admitted without charge. To talk with the managers and to read the reports and to visit the institution is all that is necessary to convince any one that these people are doing one of the best philanthropic works of any in the State.

To our friends in the East as well as in the West this is an open field for philanthropy, which I hope that Friends will not overlook. If we could establish and endow an institution of this character we could not only do a great good to the world at large, but we could also restore to health and happiness a great many Friends throughout the United States who will otherwise go to an early grave.

* A paper read at the Colorado Friends' Assembly.

This is a subject worthy of our most thorough investigation, and it certainly appeals to every community in the East as well as the West. To my mind there is no greater field open to the philanthropist for relieving the pain and suffering of those who are not wanted any place else than the field just mentioned.

I trust that Friends will give this matter careful and prayerful consideration. There are, no doubt, hundreds of Friends in the East who would be glad to take advantage of our Colorado climate if they could see their way clear to make a living and provide for their families here.

It is therefore within the province of this paper to point out some of the possibilities in a financial way in this State. Our cities and towns offer as many advantages to the professional man and tradesman as other cities of the same size and character. To the one who is easily discouraged every line is as much overdone here as any place else; but to the hard-working Friends there is as good an opening in this State as any place else. Since a large per cent. of our Friends are from the rural districts, prospects in an agricultural way are perhaps more interesting than anything else. There are as good opportunities in the farming and stock-raising districts to the north of Denver as there are in any of our Eastern agricultural States.

To be sure, irrigated land commands a very high price; but it does not take nearly so many acres to support the family here as it does where irrigation is not necessary. In this territory they can raise small grain, Irish potatoes, sugar beets and all kinds of fruit adapted to this climate. The dairying and stock-raising industries are such that the farmers coming from the Mississippi Valley can find locations well adapted to farming in a way very similar to that they have been accustomed to.

In this locality one is benefited by the healthful climate where the summers are cool and the winters are mild. The irrigation makes the crops very sure. The man with a trade can get good wages in the rural or mining towns. William P. S. Cattell, or John Fry, of Boulder, would be glad to give any further information about this section.

The educational institutions of the State are young and small, but the young men and women from all over the United States find them very satisfactory. The public school system is perhaps as good as any of the Eastern States.

To our Friends who are interested in the stock-raising industry a word might be said along that line. To the east and south of us are great stretches of range for cattle. In the southern sections of the State we find ranches well adapted for breeding purposes, and the yearling and two-year-old are sold and shipped to the northern part of this State and other States. As a rule, this business requires more capital than some others, but there are thousands of acres of public land to be had for grazing purposes free.

During the last ten years a number of Friends have located on the western slope, in and around Paonia, Grand Junction and other points. Almost without exception these Friends have been very successful, and some of them have doubled their investments several times. In these fruit districts the man with $1,000 can buy a $5,000 or $10,000 orchard, and some of our Friends have been able to pay for their land in two or three years. A great deal might be said along this line, but to those who are especially interested it would be much better to refer them to Alfred Hadley, or Alfred Allen, cashier of the National Bank of Paonia, or Harvey Crumley, of Grand Junction.

These men have all been very successful and would be pleased to help other Friends to locate in whatever section of the country they may desire. Friends have always been very successful in building up a new country. There is certainly an excellent opportunity now open in this State along the line of the Moffat Road. Thousands of settlers will flock to Routt County during the next few years. There is no reason why Friends should not have their share of this vast territory with its fertile fields and abundant store of mineral wealth. There are, no doubt, numerous valleys where with the expenditure of several thousand dollars, Friends could secure a good water right by constructing an irrigation ditch and then take up the Government land.

The writer has received a letter from Montrose stating that there is a tract of from ten to fifteen thousand acres of Government land which could be secured and a good ditch put through it. It is not the province of this paper to go into the details of farming, fruit, stock or mining business, but to simply make a few suggestions which might be worked out and be of interest to Friends here as well as those in the East.

We have perhaps said enough about the possibilities from the financial line, and we might ask again, Does Colorado need Friends? A few years ago a little meeting was organized in Denver which has had a varied experience, but at present has a good membership, and we feel that it has a place in the religious work of the city.

A little later a meeting was organized at Boulder, and as to its success many are much better able to speak than I. Only a few months ago a meeting was organized at Paonia which bids fair to outstrip all others in numbers, and we trust in influence and power for good as well. Friends have met from time to time in other places in the State, but at present we have but three permanent organizations. It remains for our new prospective quarterly meeting to decide whether we shall work together and try to extend our influence into new fields. The Maker of the universe has certainly given us all the natural advantages in a productive soil and a healthful climate. The most of us are glad we are here, and we have been comparatively prosperous. The question is: Do we want to cast our influence in any new fields where it will bring forth an abundant harvest.

The mining camps of the State give us an open field for the real, genuine missionary work. Throughout this whole mountainous district there are numerous valleys where good work can and ought to be done. One Friend writes that he knows of two places where the valleys are four miles wide by twenty long, and they are without a single church or Sabbath School. He insists that the financial opportunities will catch the most people, but the denominational opportunities will catch the best people. Every neighborhood needs a few real Christians where individuals can show that living a Christian life amounts to a great deal more than preaching it.

Here in the West we are surrounded by a hurrying, restless throng of wealth-seekers who certainly need the quiet, firm, cheerful Quaker life to help them on their way. There is perhaps no better illustration of what a few strong, energetic and faithful Christians can do than is shown by the work of our Friends in the North Fork Valley in and around Paonia. Eleven years ago there was not a Christian organization in many miles of Paonia, and in many cases they thought that such an institution was not needed. To-day there are six churches in this one town, and we are pleased to know that the influence of Friends is no small factor. In the financial and religious influence in this place that which has happened here ought to happen in a dozen other towns during the next few years. The field is open, and it remains for those of you who are here to-day to decide whether we want to take more definite steps to extend our influence and to bring others in to help us. There is no denominational educational institution on the Western slope. The field is now ripe to harvest and the laborers indeed are few, but are we doing everything we can?

There is now an open door for more aggressive definite work at Colorado Springs, Fundus, Montrose, Canon City, Grand Junction, and perhaps several other places. This summer school and coming quarterly meeting ought to bind together the efforts and the energies of every Friend in the State, and there is certainly no reason why we should not be able to do a larger work in the next ten years than we have done in the past ten.

Have you done your part to inform others of the benefits to be derived from this climate? Have you done all you could to help others to find a suitable place? Have you put forth your best efforts to promulgate Friends' doctrine in regard to peace, arbitration, temperance and individual responsibility to and communion with the ever-living God? Until we can answer these questions in the affirmative we have not done our whole duty to our fellowmen. May God help us as individuals to do our part and then let us unite in doing the greatest good to the greatest number.

P. S.—Since this article was read more than a dozen Friends have moved to Colorado in search of health. If Friends are doing well where they are they should stay there, but if you have to make a change the above-mentioned Friends will be glad to give you any information possible. We are anxious to have Eastern Friends locate where they can help the Church as well as where our Friends can help them.

Denver, Col.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING.

The thirteenth annual session of Wilmington Yearly Meeting began with the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight at ten o'clock Eighth month 17th, and closed at noon on the 24th.

The coming, during the early days of the yearly meeting, of copious and much-needed showers, was a cause of great thankfulness, notwithstanding the fact that it materially lessened the attendance of several of the sessions.

A smaller number than usual of visiting ministers and Christian workers was present, those in attendance being Allen Jay and wife, Prof. Elbert Russell and Oscar Moon, of Indiana Yearly Meeting; Levi Mills and wife, of California; George H. Moore, of Western; and S. Adelbert Wood, Martha E. Barber and Harry Hole, of Ohio.

A large part of the concern of the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight was for a ministry better prepared for its work, one that shall be able under the power of the Spirit not only to add to the numbers of the church, but that shall also be edifying, broadening and developing in its influence on those already within its fold. Wilmington College was thought to have an important field of service before it in this line, and the proposed addition of a Biblical department to its courses of study met with the hearty approval of the "select body."

James B. Unthank, who has been presiding clerk since the establishment of the yearly meeting, having removed from its limits, and William B. Livezey, the recording clerk of last year, being confined at home by sickness, the yearly meeting proper was called to order by Mary Edwards, reading clerk. Usual matters of routine occupied the first session. At the afternoon session the representatives reported Jonathan B. Wright for presiding clerk, Emma Spencer Townsend for recording clerk, Nancy A. C. Leonard for reading clerk, and R. B. Peelle for announcing clerk. The session was occupied by the report of the Committee on Bible Schools and a very able address from George H. Moore, of Paoli, Ind., on "The Bible School as a Department of Church Work."

The evening session, devoted to peace and arbitration, was shadowed by the recent death of the chairman of that committee, Seth H. Ellis, who was to have addressed the meeting. The principal work of the committee for the year has been the encouragement and help rendered to two bright and consecrated students of the college, who, under the direction of the committee, have delivered twenty-nine peace addresses.

The statistics of the year reveal some interesting facts. Deaths exceed reported births by thirty-four. Losses exceed gains by four. Two quarterly meetings decreased, one increased and one was stationary.

The losses by certificate were eighteen more than the gains from that source. The number of letters issued to other churches was the same as last year, and the number received about two and a half times as great, still eighteen more were issued than received. One hundred and seventy-two persons were received by request, which is eighty-five more than last year.

Some items from the Pastoral and Evangelistic Committee's report may be given in this connection. Thirty-two out of forty-two meetings have some degree of pastoral care. Six ministers give all their time to the work and receive support, and twenty give some time and receive a partial support. The amount contributed for pastoral support is twelve per cent. more than in any previous year, and that for evangelistic work a gain of five per cent. over last year.

It is a notable fact that while series of meetings have been held in nearly all the meetings, the number of conversions and additions to the church resulting from regular pastoral work is much larger than that from the special services. Josephus Hoskins, the efficient general superintendent of this work, was continued for another year.

A proposition of President Albert J. Brown that a committee be appointed to make a careful study of actual conditions throughout the yearly meeting, and report next year the four most pressing needs revealed by their study, was adopted. A committee of twelve was appointed, and an appropriation of fifty dollars made to cover expenses of correspondence, etc., in their investigations. The committee was organized with Albert J. Brown as chairman and Robert E. Pretlow as secretary-treasurer.

The Home Mission Committee presented with its report a brief program, and short speeches from visiting ministers. The temperance session adopted a short series of resolutions, and was afterwards addressed by Robert E. Pretlow on "The Power and Purpose of the Church in its Relation to the Liquor Traffic."

The Christian Endeavor rally, after a lengthy program, listened to a masterly address from Prof. Elbert Russell, of Earlham College, on "Christian Endeavor and Quakerism." He showed that the best features of the Endeavor movement are but an approach to the practical outworking of the Quaker ideals, and that the young Friend is by teaching and practice fitted to be a leader in the movement. Endeavor loyalty should intensify denominational loyalty, and make the young people of our own Church more eager to know, that they may successfully defend and practice the Quaker theology.

The largest attendance at any week-day meeting was on the afternoon devoted to foreign missions. The weather that day was almost ideal, and the interest throughout the yearly meeting is decidedly on the increase. The work at Puerto Padre, under the care of Emma Phillips Martinez and Eva Terrell, is in a flourishing condition, and steps are soon to be taken toward the purchase of ground and the erection of buildings, the rented property now occupied being both expensive and inadequate. The collection and subscription for mission work reached a total more than fifty per cent. larger than that of last year. Ellen C. Wright resigned from the African Board, and Lavinia Barrett was appointed in her stead.

The deepest interest of the yearly meeting, however, centered about the concerns of Wilmington College. Not only was this true of the educational meeting, but in the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, in the consideration of state of Society, in connection with the pastoral and evangelistic work, and again and again in the devotional meetings the hearts of the people turned toward the college as a chosen channel of God's blessing to the Church.

The Board was able to make a very encouraging report, indicating increased attendance, better equipment and broadening scope. An effort is being made, with encouraging progress, to raise an additional endowment of $15,000 to establish a chair of Biblical Literature. During the progress of the yearly meeting, through the tireless activity and contagious enthusiasm of President Brown, over six thousand dollars was added to the resources of the college. Twin Ash Hall was purchased and turned over to the trustees, so that both dormitories are now college property. The endowment fund and general fund were both largely increased. More than fourteen thousand dollars has been secured for the college since the opening of the last school year.

Near the close of the session the meeting took steps toward conforming the conduct of its business next year more nearly to parliamentary usages.

The ministry was directed less than in some years to the unsaved, and more to the development of the Church itself in the knowledge of the truth and the power of the Spirit that it may become an efficient cure of souls.

The contributions for the various departments of church work, while still small as compared with what some others are doing, and inadequate to our needs, denote a healthy growth toward the grace of Christian liberality.

The clerks, while new to their places, were very efficient.

The business was conducted with an almost unprecedented unity of thought and feeling, and the meeting closed under a deeply-felt baptism of tenderness, love and hope.

W. C. EDINGER.

Many persons will feel their lives made poorer by the departure of W. C. Edinger, who passed away at his home in Des Moines, Iowa, the 24th of last month. Few men in the city of Des Moines touched so wide a circle of associates and friends as he. Coming to Des Moines in his early manhood, when he was not yet 21, he moved in and out among the people a quarter of a century. His native State was Ohio, and he moved to central Iowa when 16 years of age, with his parents, two brothers and six sisters, where he resided on a farm. At that early age he saw the finger of God in all the beauties of nature, thus developing his strong love for flowers which has been so manifest during the years of his manhood. In 1884 he was married to Bertha Comfort, of Des Moines. In time two little daughters came to their home, one passing to the eternal shore in infancy, while the other daughter, Edith, is still spared to grieve with and comfort her mother. In their early married life they gave their hearts to God and united with the Grand Avenue Friends' Meeting, where in all these years his untiring zeal has been marvelous. It can be said of many, "He was faithful," but to those who knew W. C. Edinger best this expression seems far too mild. It seemed his continual interest—the last thought at the close of day and on waking the first. To many he was a friend, but it was his home and his church that felt the warmth of his friendly heart the most and his loss the keenest. Those who came into association with him could hardly fail to see that one of his deepest interests in life was the success of that modest church on Grand Avenue. God gave to him forty-four years of life in which hardly a day passed in his maturer years that some worthy action was not done, some heart helped. His aged mother, two brothers, five sisters, a loving wife and daughter, remain to grieve the loss and helpfulness of a husband, father, son and brother. Over all our hearts a deep shadow is cast, but we are comforted in the thought that while he bore with us all the frailties of the flesh, by his unshaken faith in God, he cheered many sad and discouraged hearts, and the world is better for his having lived.

The funeral services were held at the home on the 27th ult., at 10 a.m., which was made even more beautiful by the many lovely flowers sent by friends as tributes of esteem and affection. Charles W. Sweet had charge of the service, reading portions of the 14th chapter of John and the 14th and 21st chapters of Revelation, reading and speaking in his God-given sympathetic manner of Brother Edinger's love for God, the church and his fellows in the business world, committing us all to Him who alone can heal our broken hearts and show us how to work more zealously for Him in our dear church. Charles W. Sweet and Brother Edinger were peculiarly bound together in the seven years of labor for Christ, the departed showing more than ordinary love for him, even longing to see him every day. The singing was sweet and beautiful by those who had mingled their voices with his in the praises of God. He was laid away in Woodland Cemetery.

LESSON XII.

NINTH MONTH 18, 1904.

ISRAEL REPROVED.

Amos 5: 4-15

GOLDEN TEXT.—Seek the Lord, and ye shall live.—Amos 5: 6.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Ninth mo. 12.—Lamentation and exhortation. Amos 5: 1-6.
Third-day, Ninth mo. 13.—Israel's condition. Amos 5: 7-13.
Fourth-day, Ninth mo. 14.—A day of darkness. Amos 5: 14-20.
Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 15.—Israel rejected. Amos 5: 21-27.
Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 16.—Punishment because of sin. Isa. 24: 1-12.
Seventh-day, Ninth mo. 17.—Mercy offered. Isa. 55: 6-13.
First-day, Ninth mo. 18.—The wise. Prov. 23: 6-23.

Time.—During the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II. (Amos 1: 1), about 760 B.C., and therefore about 100 years after the time of the last lesson.

Place.—Amos lived at Tekoa, about ten miles south of Jerusalem, but gave his prophecies at Bethel, about fourteen miles north of Jerusalem, in the kingdom of Israel.

Rulers.—Jeroboam II., King of Israel; Uzziah was King of Judah.

Contemporary Prophets.—Uncertain, but possibly during part of his life, Hosea and Joel.

Amos is personally one of the most interesting of the prophets. He was not educated theologically; that is, he had not attended a school of the prophets, for he says, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son, but I was a herdsman and a dresser of sycamore trees: and the Lord took me from following the flock." (Amos 7: 14, 15.) In other words, he was what would be called a layman, and the message of the Lord came to him. He was sent not to the people of Judah, but to those of Israel. The northern kingdom, though outwardly prosperous, was tending towards its fall. There was abundance of wealth and luxury, as the words of Amos show. (Amos 6: 3-6, etc.) But the spiritual condition of the people was very low, and immorality was rampant. The arraignment of Amos is terribly severe. The character of Amos is well indicated in his words. He received the message and simply, strongly and fearlessly delivered it. To Amos more than to any of his predecessors was Israel indebted for the revelation that Jehovah was not simply the God of the Hebrews, but was the God of the whole earth and of all nations. Probably the very earliest of the prophets whose separate prophecies have come down to us, he is also one of the most striking, and one whose language is the most forcible; he "has a splendor and intensity of rhetoric in which he is surpassed by Isaiah alone." To gain the true meaning of the prophecies of Amos the whole book should be read. The lesson is taken from the direct message to the kingdom of Israel.

4. "Seek ye me." Not only by consulting his prophets, but by living a righteous life. "Shall live." That is, escape the woes and disasters of which Amos had been speaking.

5. "Seek not Bethel," etc. All these places by the time of Amos had become centers of idolatrous worship. It was equivalent to saying, "abandon idolatry, for it will come to naught."

6. "Seek ye the Lord." Compare Isa. 55: 6, 7. "Lest he break out like fire in the house of Joseph." That is, in the northern kingdom; Joseph being used for Ephraim and Manasseh, the largest and most populous tribes. Ephraim and Manasseh were the sons of Joseph.

7. "Ye who turn judgment to wormwood." Those who decide so unjustly that those who are affected by the decision feel that it is bitter, that they have been treated unjustly. "Cast down righteousness." Revised Version. Knowingly reject righteous decrees and uphold iniquity.

8. A magnificent description of the power of the Lord over nature. "Turneth the shadow of death into the morning." This probably means turneth the blackness of night into morning. "The day dark with night." The reverse of the preceding clause. He turneth night into day, and day into night. "Poureth them out upon the face of the earth." Heavy rains or floods are probably meant.

9. "That bringeth sudden destruction upon the strong, so that destruction cometh upon the fortress." Revised Version. This is much clearer than the authorized version. The meaning is, that no matter how strong a man may be the power of the Lord can bring destruction upon him, even though he be in a fortress.

10. "They." The unjust hate the just judge and the truthful and upright man. "Gate." In those times the judges sat in the gateways of the city to hear cases and give judgment.

11. "Forasmuch therefore as ye trample upon the poor." Revised Version. Oppress them. "Take exactions from him of wheat." The taxes were paid in kind, as they are to-day in parts of Turkey, and the farmer is almost at the mercy of the tax-gatherer. "Hewn stone." This shows the wealth and luxury which existed, for the ordinary building material was burnt or sun-dried brick. They shall not enjoy the luxuries which they prepared for themselves. That there was much drunkenness in the land seems evident from several passages in Amos. See 2: 8; 4: 1; 6: 6, etc.

12. "For I know how manifold are your transgressions and how mighty are your sins." Revised Version. Jehovah is fully aware of your sins; they cannot be hidden from Him. Compare Job 22: 13; Psa. 73: 11. "Ye that afflict the just," etc. These are just the particulars in which in those days there would be special opportunity for injustice and wickedness.

13. In these evil times the prudent man keeps silent, for to speak would bring him into danger. Amos was not governed by prudence or expediency, for the Lord had given him a special message to deliver.

14. He repeats the burden of his exhortation. "As ye have spoken." The Israelites still called themselves the followers of Jehovah. (Amos 3: 2.)

15. "Establish judgment." Set it up where it has been thrown down. See verse 7. "The remnant of Joseph." Those who still cling to the Lord. Compare Amos 9: 8-15; Isa. 11: 11; Mic. 4: 7.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The way of Amos is still the only safe way—"Seek good and not evil"; "hate the evil, and love the good."

2. Riches and luxury do not make either individuals or nations really great.

3. "Righteousness exalteth a nation."

4. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." The harvest may be deferred, but it will surely come.

"The pleasure of Jehovah shall prosper in His hand." This is the hopeful prophecy of one who foresaw the Messiah's coming as the beginning of a world deliverance. Isaiah saw past the oppression and affliction to the dividing of the spoil. We to-day look back upon the sacrifice that wrought our redemption and live among the achievements of the risen Christ.

These words were spoken when but a remnant of the chosen nation remained faithful to God. When Jesus came Judea was in the hands of her enemies, and "His own received Him not"; the culture of Greece and the might of Rome were polluted with a corruptness that beggars description; but bravely He offered Himself for the world, and now remains the question as to what has been and is being accomplished.

The "pleasure of Jehovah" is purity and honor and uprightness in all things; and while too much remains of the impure and the dishonorable and the degraded, it is not embodied in the religious rites of the great nations of the world as was true before Christianity came. Nor is it possible now for a man to look with complacency upon his own life, or let it be known to others, if sordid and cruel desires have free play there; yet men have thus lived and gone through their daily ritual before the gods as if religion and life were things apart.

The nations of the world that mark its progress have a different standard of government from the brutality of a Nero or the intrigue of the Medicis or the terrors of the Inquisition; yet the seats of power were once within the bounds of Italy and Spain. Dark enough are the pictures of political corruption that may be painted yet, but the darkness is emphasized most of all by the prevalent and increasing light.

Nowhere do we see in material form a more striking proof of the world's betterment than in the treatment of the unfortunate. The imbecile, the insane, the hopelessly diseased, the criminal, who once suffered so hopelessly and cruelly are surrounded to-day by the merciful helpfulness of institutions founded in love and governed by the law of love, and here, too, the pleasure of Jehovah prospers.

In the ennobling of public and private life, in the spread of the Gospel over all the earth, in the widening application of the principles of the Golden Rule, and the Sermon on the Mount, much as yet remains to urge us to a better fulfillment of the law of righteousness, there is abundant proof of the fact that the old prophet spoke truly, and that the labor of Christ and of His servants is not in vain.

WORK OF THE FRIENDS' W. F. M. S.

The issue of the "Friends' Missionary Advocate" for Ninth month contains the annual report of the Department of Interest and Organization, from which we take the following:

FOR YEAR ENDING FIFTH MONTH 1904.

	No. of congregations in the yearly meeting.	No. of Auxiliaries.	No. of members.	Amount of money raised this year.	No. of missionaries or teachers.	No. of native workers.	No. of children in training supported by W. F. M. S.	School carried on by W. F. M. S.	No. of pupils in day school.

Kansas

There has been the usual difficulty in getting statistics that were accurate, each yearly meeting mentioning this point with the report sent in. But in spite of this there is in them the proof of much faithfulness and hard work, and there is vastly more to encourage and stimulate, as the field is viewed than there is to discourage, because we know that much of the best work done, and of the fruit of the same, cannot be tabulated.

Kansas furnishes no statistics, but Phebe M. Barnard, who serves the W. F. M. Union in that yearly meeting writes: "On account of Hannah Sleeper's death there was no report of the work last year for this department to the yearly meeting, and it is impossible for me at this time to make a report. Some of the quarterly meetings are doing good work, and I think none of the societies have been discontinued."

In addition to the statistics we find these items as foot-notes.

New England reports four of their honorary members are also life-members, and adds: "We have emphasized the value of securing life-membership and memorial membership payments, and these have made us a nice little permanent fund. I think all our life-members pay annual dues also, but after their death the permanent fund still does its beneficent work."

Of the four missionaries supported by them, three are at Ramallah, and one, Dr. Abigail Goddard, is in India as one of the staff of missionaries in the Ohio field there. In spite of the hard times they have raised $131.33 more than last year, and that fact will awaken a note of praise in all our hearts.

Ohio finds it difficult to count their regular contributors, as public subscriptions are often for the whole family. This leaves the doubt on the right side, as we know by this there are more contributors than the figures indicate.

Western says the general interest in missions over the yearly meeting was never better, and yet the figures given are not so good as heretofore owing to incomplete statistics.

New York speaks of their work being scattered as follows: A school at Orpha, Palestine, the only Protestant School there; our orphan children in India, Dr. DeVol's work in China, and native evangelist in Japan, who has been the means of so many conversions, all demand our continued support, and none of us want to drop any of it.

Canada mentions one mission band organized during the year by one auxiliary.

Indiana answers the four departments reasonably well developed excepting the Junior.

California gives the entire support to two missionaries, joins the yearly meeting board in the support of three others, and contributes some to the support of four others and to three city missionaries.

We find some other points of interest revealed, but not mentioned in the reports, as these:

Ohio is the only yearly meeting that has other yearly meetings associated with it in the support of its fields, these being New York, New England and North Carolina, each of which support some of their own members in the work in India and China.

Ohio and California each have one self-supporting missionary.

Canada's work is joined with Philadelphia's in Japan. Of the yearly meetings that receive no help from other yearly meetings we find California averages a trifle less than $8.00 per member.

ELIZA C. ARMSTRONG, Gen. Sec.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Herbert Reynolds preached to good audiences at Maywood, Ind., at the evening service, the 28th ult.

Eliza Armstrong gave a fine talk on missionary work to Bridgeport, Ind., Christian Endeavor, Sabbath evening, the 28th ult.

North Branch Academy opened Ninth month 6th, instead of the 13th, as previously announced in our Educational Number.

A promising Christian Endeavor Society has been organized in the mission at Holguin, Cuba, with fourteen active members and four associate members.

Nereus M. Hodgin will continue to serve as pastor in West Union and Highland Meetings, Ind., for another year, and Willis Bond in Mooresville Meeting.

Walnut Creek Quarterly Meeting was held at North Branch, Kansas, the 12th to 15th ult. Edith Stanton, a minister from Wichita, was in attendance and did faithful and efficient service.

The report of Ohio Yearly Meeting will appear next week. After a long discussion, the yearly meeting decided to meet next year in the city of Columbus. It has for many years alternated between Mt. Pleasant and Damascus.

Laura Mattern, the superintendent of the Bible School at Bridgeport, Ind., had the entire school at her home for a lawn social one evening last month. Songs and music by Gilbert brothers, and some short talks by members of the school made the evening one of profit.

The Friends in Wilmington, Ohio, have taken a very prominent part in the great struggle in that city against the saloon. The temperance forces were victorious in the election, and after a stubborn fight got a majority for no license. The election returns were contested in the courts, and again the temperance forces won. Robert E. Pretlow did valiant work.

A Friend from Idaho writes that she has a copy of the beautiful lines which were published in our columns Eighth month 4th, beginning, "Tell thou my friends when weeping," and she says that the poem was written by Ahmed el Ghazallah, one of the sages of Persia in the eleventh century. Her copy of the poem is entitled, "The Persian Poet's Farewell." Do any of our readers know anything more about the poem or the author?

Murray S. Kenworthy has just closed his second pastoral year with Union Street congregation, Friends' Church, Kokomo, Ind., and is about to leave for his work at Earlham College. His ministry has been evangelical and faithful, and his labors and influence with the membership and in the city have been to an exceptional degree for practical righteousness and moral reform. The good wishes of many friends will follow him and his estimable wife as they enter upon new relations elsewhere.

Dr. Clotilde Pretlow, Santos Trevino and Mary Ellis, accompanied by four native Christians, made an evangelistic trip in Eighth month to Potrerillo, Cuba, the mission conducted by the Christian Endeavor Society of the Gibara Monthly Meeting—across the bay by boat, across country in a big wagon. After a good gospel service in the evening they returned home next morning bruised by jolting over Cuban roads, and drenched by a heavy tropical shower, but with ardor undampened in the Master's service.

Maria de los Santos Trevino and Mary Louise Ellis were greatly favored of the Lord in conducting a gospel meeting recently in Auras, Cuba, a sub-station of the mission at Holguin. The gospel hymns, sung in Spanish, accompanied by Mary Ellis with her portable organ, were very much appreciated by the large audience of about 300 people. The gospel message of Maria Trevino was also listened to with reverent attention. These two earnest workers have returned from a few days visit among missionaries and other friends in Gibara, to begin active preparations for opening another year's work in the school at Holguin.

The prospect is favorable for a good yearly meeting at Plainfield, Ind., this year. Let us pray that revival fires may be kindled in many hearts. Public meetings will be addressed by Mrs. Beauchamp, Louisville, Ky.; Mrs. Charlton Edholm, Oakland, Cal.; Dr. Blanchard, President Wheaton College; Elbert Russell, Earlham College, and others. Among the subjects to be treated are the following: "Quaker Literature," "Attitude of Friends' Church Toward Memorial and Decoration Day Services and Toward Burial Services Performed by Secret Orders," "The Pastor: His Physical, Mental and Spiritual Qualifications and Development."

From a letter from Banes, Cuba: "I see things every day in the lives of the converts that to me evidence the working of the Holy Spirit. In three different homes where I called last week I found them reading the Bible. In one the father was reading to his sons; in another the wife was studying the Bible while her husband was working; in the third the head of the family was reading aloud. In one home the custom is to gather the family together every night in prayer. The father said that when they missed having their season of prayer things seemed to go wrong. One family, being at work far from the church, when we held our mid-week meeting, took their Bibles and hymn-books at the time and held a service where they were."

White Lick Quarterly Meeting (Western Yearly Meeting), held the 13th ult., was a season of unusual blessing and interest. Harvey H. Dicks, of Fairmount, Ind., attended; also Thomas C. Brown, Yearly Meeting Superintendent. Martilla Cox, of Indianapolis, was present on Seventh- and First-days, and Louis E. Stout, of Plainfield, on Seventh-day. The Gospel was preached in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power. Three services were held on First-day; one at 10 a.m., one at 2.30 and another at 7.30 p.m. Harvey Dicks preached in the morning, Thomas C. Brown in the afternoon, and Martilla Cox in the evening.

The Woods County, Okla., W. C. T. U. reports thirty-two unions, a gain of nineteen over last year. Fifty lectures have been given by Dr. George E. Wright, and several by Mary E. Sibbitt, Wm. Pilot and others. The themes have been "Prohibition Statehood," "Christian Citizenship" and "Proper Environment for the Rising Generation." The first diamond medal of the Territory was awarded Inez Carlos, of Alva. Another is to be given at the Territorial convention, held at El Reno, Ninth month 16th. There are over forty saloons in the county, but leading politicians say the W. C. T. U. work is making it unpopular to drink, and the saloon business will not pay much longer. The county officers are all Friends but one. M. S. Fellow was unanimously elected president for a third year's work. At Cherokee, where Friends predominate, and where there is no saloon in the town, the union reports sixty-five active and twenty-eight honorary members; five red-letter days observed; sixteen departments of work active, and $133.84 raised. Other unions have done good work.

Wm. Perry Haworth delivered his farewell sermon at Noblesville, Ind., on First-day morning, Eighth month 28th. He now takes up the duties of general superintendent of the field in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory for the Associated Committee on Indian Affairs. His labors in the meeting at Noblesville were attended with increasing success. Satisfaction with his work and regret at his leaving are general throughout the meeting, although the Friends rejoice in the belief that he is entering a wider field of service, and regard it as a promotion in the Master's service. During the past year the long-standing indebtedness was almost wiped out, the small portion remaining unpaid being more than carried by the income on a residence property owned by the monthly meeting. In view of the termination of Wm. P. Haworth's term of service a month earlier than had been anticipated, it became necessary to close the year's financial arrangements on short notice. This was more than done, leaving a small surplus in the treasurer's hands. The outlook for the coming year is cheerful, arrangements having been made with Josiah R. Hawkins, of Indiana Yearly Meeting, for his labors as pastor, the plan providing that he shall enter upon the work at the close of Western Yearly Meeting late in Ninth month.

The Hamburg-American Line steamship Deutschland sailed from New York the 1st inst. with the unusually large consignment of 2,272 bags of mail for England and Germany. The line will make an attempt to establish a new record for the delivery of mail between this country and London. If the weather continues favorable the mail will be ready for delivery on Fourth-day morning, or less than six days from the time it left the New York Postoffice.

In such a world as this, with such hearts as ours, weakness is wickedness in the long run. Whoever lets himself be shaped and guided by any thing lower than an inflexible will, fixed in obedience to God, will in the end be shaped into a deformity and guided to wreck and ruin. —A. Maclaren.

BUILDING FOOD

To Bring the Babies Around.

When a little human machine (or a large one) goes wrong, nothing is so important as the selection of food which will always bring it around again.

"My little baby boy, fifteen months old, had pneumonia; then came brain fever, and no sooner had he got over these than he began to cut teeth, and, being so weak, he was frequently thrown into convulsions," says a Colorado mother.

"I decided a change might help, so took him to Kansas City for a visit. When we got there he was so very weak when he would cry he would sink away, and seemed like he would die.

"When I reached my sister's home she said immediately that we must feed him Grape-Nuts, and, although I had never used the food, we got some and for a few days gave him just the juice of Grape-Nuts and milk. He got stronger so quickly we were soon feeding him the Grape-Nuts itself, and in a wonderfully short time he fattened right up and became strong and well.

"That showed me something worth knowing, and, when later on my girl came, I raised her on Grape-Nuts and she is a strong, healthy baby and has been. You will see from the little photograph I send you what a strong, chubby youngster the boy is now, but he didn't look anything like that before we found this nourishing food. Grape-Nuts nourished him back to strength when he was so weak he couldn't keep any other food on his stomach." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

All children can be built to a more sturdy and healthy condition upon Grape-Nuts and cream. The food contains the elements nature demands, from which to make the soft gray filling in the nerve centres and brain. A well-fed brain and strong, sturdy nerves absolutely insure a healthy body.

Look in each package for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

SUBSTITUTES FOR THE SALOON.

WE ALWAYS dislike to encourage any controversy which at all engenders heat, but there seems still to be some misunderstanding of our position on the saloon evil, and we venture a further word. We print herewith C. E. Newlin's criticism of the editorial of Ninth month 1st:

You seem entirely to confuse the saloon-keeper and the patron of the "poor man's club." It is true, as you say, that it is the duty of the State to protect society by confining the counterfeiter and horse-thief, and, by furnishing them useful occupation, try to reform them. It may be the duty of the State to do the same thing with the criminals who persist in illegally selling liquor, after the sale is outlawed. But is it the duty of the State or society to refrain from outlawing these occupations until some other pastime is furnished the victim of the counterfeiter and horse-thief? So far as I know no one has ever advocated the "temperance saloon" for the sake of furnishing the poor saloon-keeper and bar-tender another occupation. On the other hand, where is the justification for sober, industrious society being compelled to furnish a temperance place of meeting for those who now furnish their own intemperate place of meeting, at a cost many times the cost of such a place without the intoxicating liquor?

Could you hear the glee with which my Democratic and Republican friends have read your editorial to me in defense of their theory that the saloon cannot and must not be outlawed until we have successfully established these temperance saloons, you would understand the seriousness of your position. I have re-read both your editorials carefully, and I cannot find one line that would in any way intimate to any one that you think the liquor traffic should now at once be outlawed as a beginning to its extermination. Instead, there is much ground for the defender of the license system thinking you approve of that system until we can successfully establish temperance substitutes. I can not believe this is your position, and therefore consider your position so lacking in clearness as to be very dangerous.

(1) It did not occur to us that any one who had for ten years read our editorials would suppose that we approved of licensing the saloon. We took it for granted that everybody knew that we considered the saloon an iniquitous institution, no more to be comfortably tolerated than any other method of human destruction. Perhaps we should do as old Roman Cato did—introduce every article with the words, "It must be destroyed."

At any rate, for those who still have missed the meaning of what has been said in the past, let it be said once for all—the saloon must be destroyed. That attitude goes with all we may say of the saloon.

(2) Now comes up the question of the "club" idea. Nobody can suppose that we consider a "club" of any sort a good substitute for a home where the true "family idea" is realized. But we have learned, after some years of earthly experience, to look at facts instead of lulling our souls with happy ideals. We have been studying the actual habits of men as they are. And this much needs to be said here, that in undertaking to remake human society we must start with it as it is, not as we wish it were. Well, there is a very large multitude of men—unfortunately, too, many women—who meet for their social life in club rooms. It is a low stage of civilization, but one which now widely prevails. A similar form of life exists in country villages and among working men everywhere on the globe, so far as we know. They meet in groups, and have their social life in a way which would not appeal to most of us. At present workingmen meet mainly in saloons, and they maintain their "club" at an enormous expense. The fact that this situation exists is too plain to be denied.

(3) Now, "must we refrain from outlawing the saloon until we have successfully established temperance substitutes"? Of course not. The saloon is to be destroyed just as rapidly as it can be destroyed. But those who are in the saloon destroying business have discovered some stern facts. The saloon cannot be destroyed until the citizens of this country want it destroyed. It cannot be done by "resolutions" or by conferences of temperance orators. The saloon is at present an enormous social and political institution which can be conquered only by the construction of better social and political institutions.

(4) This does not mean that the prohibitionist is to stop his activities. Not in the slightest. He must simply recognize that his victory depends on larger statesmanship than he realized when he began his brave fight. It does not mean that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is to slacken its work. Not in the slightest. Every boy saved is so much gained. Every no-license victory is a triumph for righteousness. Every city and every State which will vote down the saloon and then keep it out helps bring the final victory nearer.

(5) But a part of our work lies here—in winning to a better life and a better society those who now frequent the saloon and make it their "club-house." They are not ideal men, and we must not try too lofty ideals on them. They are, however, an enormous factor in this problem of ours. We have got to learn how to deal adequately with this part of our civilization before the saloon is out to stay out.

(6) Our friend asks, "Is industrious society to be compelled to furnish a temperance place of meeting for those who now furnish their own intemperate place of meeting"? No, it is not compelled to do it. We are not compelled to build churches, or to maintain any institutions to improve humanity. The only ground for maintaining temperance substitutes for the saloon is that it is one of the many ways of attacking the saloon. It, however, must not be a charitable affair. It must be self-supporting or no working man will have anything to do with it.

"THE FIRST PUBLISHERS OF TRUTH."

A vigorous effort was made in the lifetime of George Fox to get accurate accounts written of the way in which "truth and light first broke forth" in the various sections of Great Britain.

London Yearly Meeting, in 1676, "agreed and concluded":

1. That Friends of the monthly and quarterly meetings of each county be reminded to keep an exact account among themselves of those that first brought the message of glad tidings among them.

2. That their sufferings (to wit, of those first messengers), whether at steeple houses, markett places, or otherwise, be also recorded.

3. What friends first received them and their message.

Similar minutes, increasing in length and urgency, were sent down to the subordinate meetings until 1720. The result was that the "oldest inhabitant" and all weighty Friends were questioned by committees, and accounts were prepared telling "who first published the truth"; "what reception the truth had"; "what opposition the truth received" and "what judgments came upon those who opposed the truth."

Ninety manuscripts devoted to these and similar questions have been preserved in Devonshire library in London. These papers are now tender with age and could not be read and handled by the public without being destroyed.

Friends' Historical Society has taken up the work of publishing them, and the first installment is already off the press. The story of these "first publishers of truth" is a very simple one, so simple that it is quite easy to miss the grandeur and heroism which lie back of these plain narratives. There never was less attempt to write a large story. The saints and martyrs of these simple pages are just plain men and women in country clothes, with no halos or miracles. The accounts are written mostly by those who were a part of all that had happened and who remembered "that antient and faithfull friend, George Fox," and who were "convinced" when it cost much to say "thou." They tell of meetings in orchards, in public squares, in market places and in steeple houses, as well as in private houses and in meeting houses. The great figures of early Quakerism are all here: Edward Burrough, John Camm, Francis Howgill, John Audland, William Dewsbury and many more who in their degree were "sons of thunder and sons of consolation," while the great man who was always at the forefront of the battle is George Fox. The writers love to tell how he came to their county and called them to "a free gospel," and how under his ministry the light broke forth.

The only regret we have in reading these accounts of the "beginnings of Quakerism" is the strong emphasis which is put upon the "judgments" which came to those who opposed these first messengers. It was natural, after all they suffered, that they should dwell on the way in which the divine hand fell upon their enemies, and it is remarkable how many of these brutal disturbers were suddenly "cut off," but one wishes that these things had not been quite so prominent in the thought of those who were apostles of the light, and who were called to make known a gospel of love and not of judgment.

However, we must not expect too much of these seventeenth century saints. They were men like us, and the entire sway of love comes very slowly, and it must be said that they made more account of it when an enemy was "convinced" than they did when he was "cut off."

The documents will be of great value to the historian of the period, and they are noble annals for any people. The Historical Society has done a good service.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

WE PUBLISH in another column this week more definite information than we were able to give last week concerning The International Peace Conference in Boston. Friends will find that their reception in Boston next month will be quite different from that which was given to the early delegations of Quakers who came to the Puritan city.

THE report of the chief secretary of the World's Fourth Sunday School Convention, which was held in Jerusalem last spring, gives some very interesting facts. It announces that there are, or rather were then, 260,905 Protestant Sunday Schools that have been heard from. They enroll 2,414,757 teachers and 23,442,998 scholars! This is the total for the world. The United States leads all other countries with 139,817 schools, 1,149,807 teachers and 11,493,591 scholars, which is only a little under one-half of all the world. Great Britain comes next. Greece stands lowest on the list of the countries from which there were reports. It has four schools, seven teachers and one hundred and eighty scholars. Athens is not the eye of the world to-day. Those who lead the world in modern times study the Bible.

DEFENDERS OF THE FAITH.

BY JOHN E. M'FADYEN.

A strangely pathetic interest attaches to a great disciple when we find him making a great mistake. For even loyal disciples are not infallible. Sometimes they seriously misrepresent the mind of Jesus, and have to be brought back to wisdom by the stern way of rebuke. Such a rebuke was once administered to John the beloved. And it was very necessary, for he had been betrayed by his zeal into a great error. He had misread the large charity of Jesus. He had taken it upon him to rebuke one who had been doing beneficent work in the name of Jesus; and Jesus had been constrained to rebuke him in the memorable words, "Forbid him not."

CONDEMNED FOR DIFFERING FROM US.

The attitude of John is remarkable; more remarkable still is the reason for that attitude. "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us." One would have supposed that John might well have felt sure of this man, for he had given two indubitable proofs of being on the side of Jesus. He was casting out devils—and was not that part of the very work which Jesus had commissioned his disciples to do? And he was doing this in Jesus' name, proving thereby that he was a believer in the power of that name and a disciple at heart; for, as Jesus said, no man could do a mighty work in His name and thereafter lightly revile Him. But John, with sublime indifference to these conclusive marks of discipleship, condemns and forbids him for no better reason than that "he followeth not with us." We would say it was amazing if we did not know that it was the way of the human heart always.

Apparently, then, it is possible for those who love Jesus dearly to misunderstand Him seriously, and to hamper the work of others who are serving Him with as much zeal as themselves and with more intelligence; for we cannot help feeling that the unknown man who owes his place in history to John's foolish rebuke, had an instinctive penetration into the essential conditions of discipleship far superior to John's own. For John's measure of discipleship was, at any rate for the moment, a purely external one—he followeth not with us—whereas this man felt that the true disciple is one who does the work of the Master, and that whether he follows "with us" or not, is a matter of the most utter indifference. Of course there were reasons at that time why John should have so completely, though mistakenly, identified the cause of his Master with that of his little disciple band; all the same, there is struck here the first note of that well-intentioned arrogance which has seldom been wanting in the history of the Church. It has too often seemed to the powers that be that because some one "followeth not with us," does not share their opinions or indorse their methods, he is necessarily wrong, and must therefore be denounced, censured or excommunicated, as the temper of the age suggests; whereas all the time it may be he that is right and they that are wrong. He may be, by his actions or words, interpreting the spirit of his Master far more profoundly than they; and they may need the solemn rebuke, "Forbid him not."

In this spirit which is ever ready to rebuke unconventional service, there is something not altogether to be despised, for it is animated by jealousy for the honor of the Lord. Nevertheless, it is one of the most hateful sins of which a disciple of Christ can be guilty. For in insisting upon external standards, it displays a lack of insight into the real conditions of service; in rebuking a man who is doing the work of Jesus in the name of Jesus it displays an utter lack of charity as well as of intelligence; and in hampering the work of a sincere, devoted and intelligent servant, it is injuring the work of Christ himself, and retarding the progress of the world.

NOT OURS TO SET TESTS OF DISCIPLESHIP.

What is the condition of discipleship? Surely it is not following "with us." For who are we? Poor, stupid, loveless mortals, who at the best "know in part and prophesy in part," and at the worst are but caricatures of the ideals to which we aspire. Surely it is not adhesion to us but adhesion to Christ that is the true test of discipleship. Does the man about whose loyalty we are in doubt, and whose work we are thirsting, like John, to interrupt—does he "follow with Christ?" If he does, that ought to settle the matter for us. But how shall we know whether he follows with Christ? In the last resort we cannot know, for only the Lord can look upon the heart. But so far as we may know at all, we have no other basis for judgment than that indicated by Jesus himself when He said, "By their fruits ye shall know them." What a man does is the best available index to what he is; and if the business of his life is casting out devils—and the modern world is almost as full of devils as the ancient ever was—then we may well take his loyalty for granted. Or if we must suspect it, let us suspect along with it our own intelligence; let us suspect our interpretation of the mind and heart of Christ. For if Christ was misunderstood and misrepresented even by the man who lay upon his bosom, it will be no great wonder if we misunderstand him too.

It is unspeakably pathetic that such a reason should have been so often offered throughout the history of the Church for thwarting the unconventional service of some fellow-disciple—"he followeth not with us." Is he any the worse for that? For again, let us ask, who are we? Necessarily but a fraction of the great Church of Christ, and no more infallible than any other fraction. For it is a considerable strain on our credulity to suppose that any group of mortal men has a monopoly of divine truth. Therefore our standards of judgment are necessarily limited, and may even be false, as John's were. The truculent and peremptory prohibition by which we think to do Christ honor, may be answered by Him with a rebuke. And when we shut out of our fellowship a man who is doing gracious and helpful work in the name of Jesus, the loss is rather ours than his. It is he and not we who represents the true Church; and no excommunication of ours can really deprive him of that "cheerful liberty of heart" which belongs to the brave and sincere. But he is vexed, though scarcely surprised, to find that so many who have ranged themselves under the banner of Christ have forgotten that where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

The Church, as President Rush Rhees has recently said, has often shown herself strangely "inhospitable to unfamiliar truth." Too often has her motto been, "We forbade him." Christ was brought to His cross by the chief priests, the scribes and the elders; that is, by the officials of the Church of his own time. His truth was too revolutionary and unpalatable, and they "forbade" him by nailing Him to a tree. That was the Jewish Church; here—in the story we are considering—is the Christian Church in embryo, forbidding one who cast out devils in Christ's name. It was the Church that compelled Galileo to deny what to-day every schoolboy knows to be true; and more than once within the last three centuries the Church has deliberately condemned an attitude which the advance of thought has later compelled her to tolerate, if not to accept. There is a bloody trail across the ages—trail of the innocent blood of those who were slain by the self-constituted defenders of the faith. The persecutors were by no means always bad men. They were often only conventional men, of scrupulous but unenlightened conscientiousness, who could not appreciate a nobler and more daring type of service than their own; and their weapons were the fagot, and the thumb-screw, and the rack, and the boot, and a thousand other unimaginably fiendish things forged in the furnaces of hell.

THE BETTER WAY OF TRUST AND TOLERANCE.

The weapons of persecution have changed but the spirit is ever the same—the spirit which in other days would have kindled the fagot, but which dare not do so to-day because of the brave stand for liberty and truth made by the men whom it murdered. "We forbade him"; and Jesus said: "Forbid him not." The spirit of Jesus is slowly working, and there are signs that the day is perhaps not so very far distant when men who are casting out devils in His name will be free to do their work serenely, none either daring or desiring to make them afraid. Then the true Church union will be consummated; for then men will be more eager to welcome than to forbid, more ready to accentuate the glorious hopes they share in common than the relatively trivial speculations which divide them. They will care more for the person of Christ than for a particular view of his person, and more for truth than for a specific formulation of it.

The devils are legion; and all who are striving to cast them out are the friends of Jesus. Wherever there is a man doing what in him lies, in the spirit of Jesus, to check political corruption or municipal incompetence, gambling or drunkenness, prurient literature or degrading amusements, false or inadequate conceptions of the Bible or religion, disintegrating views of private duty or social morality, there is a man—whether his methods be unconventional or not, whether he "follows with us" or not—who deserves a royal welcome from all who count themselves the friends of Jesus. "Forbid him not," says Jesus. We may indeed, in an unconsidered enthusiasm for the cause we love, defy this solemn word of Jesus; and if we please, we may rebuke or persecute the man whose chief crime is that he "followeth not with us." But let us not forget that "inasmuch as ye did it unto him, ye did it unto Me."—"The Interior."

THE INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

The thirteenth International Peace Congress will meet in Boston the first week in Tenth month, its sessions continuing during the week. The Congress opens on Second-day, Tenth month 3d. On First-day, the previous day, the services in the leading Boston churches will be devoted to the Peace cause. In the afternoon large special meetings will be held at Tremont Temple and elsewhere, with addresses by leading European and American ministers, emphasizing the duties of the churches and religious men in the Peace cause. In the evening there will be a musical prelude or consecration service at Symphony Hall; the Handel and Haydn Society, a chorus of over 400 voices, will sing, and there will be a full orchestra. In the distribution of tickets for this musical service, which are free, preference will be given to those coming to the Congress from outside Boston; and early application by mail to the Peace Congress Committee will be necessary to secure seats.

On Second-day, at Tremont Temple, the Congress will be welcomed by Hon. Patrick A. Collins, Mayor of Boston; Hon. John L. Bates, Governor of Massachusetts, and Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State, in behalf of the National Government. The deliberative meetings of the Congress will be held at Tremont Temple every forenoon during the week. In the evenings there will be public meetings, at Tremont Temple, Park Street Church, the Old South Meeting House, and Faneuil Hall, devoted to the various aspects of the Peace and Arbitration cause.

The meeting on Third-day evening will be devoted to the work and influence of The Hague Tribunal. Hon. Andrew D. White, chairman of the United States delegation at The Hague Conference, will preside; and there will be addresses by Sir John Macdonell, professor of international law in University College, London; M. Gustave Hubbard, member of the French Chamber of Deputies and editor of "L' Justice Internationale," the French review devoted to the work of The Hague Tribunal; Hon. Oscar S. Straus, one of the United States members of The Hague Tribunal; Hon. William I. Buchanan, chairman of the American delegation at the late Pan-American Congress, and others. It is hoped that Count Albert Apponyi, president of the Hungarian Chamber of Deputies and one of the members of The Hague Court for Austria-Hungary, will be present at this meeting.

Other meetings will be devoted to the reduction of national armaments, to education, to the mutual relations of races, and to the special interests and duties of working men, of business men, and of women. Among the leading women who will be present are the Baroness von Suttner, of Austria, author of "Lay Down Your Arms;" Sophia Sturge, of Birmingham; Mrs. W. P. Byles, of Manchester; Frau Selenka, of Munich; the Countess Potting, of Austria; Dr. Yamei Kin, of China; May Wright Sewall, Anna Garlin Spencer, and Jane Addams. At the Faneuil Hall meeting for working men, Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, will preside; and among the European speakers will be Herbert Burrows, of London, representing the Social Democratic Federation; Peter Curran, representing the General Federation of English Trade Unions; M. Claude Gignoux, representing the Copartnership Societies of France, and M. Henri La Fontaine, of the Belgian Senate. Details concerning the commercial meeting, the education meeting, and other meetings will be published later. The commercial meeting, addressed by strong representatives of important Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade and other leading men of affairs, will be of special significance. The meeting devoted to the principles which should control education for the creation of true international sentiment will be addressed by presidents of various universities and colleges and other leading teachers.

Among the hundred European delegates whose coming is already advised, and who will take part in the proceedings of the Congress, are noted the following:

The Bishop of Hereford; the Bishop of Ripon; William Randall Cremer, M.P.; Thomas Lough, M.P.; James Caldwell, M.P.; Duncan Vernon Pirie, M.P.; John Bryn Roberts, M.P.; Samuel Thomas Evans, M.P.; Dr. W. Evans Darby, secretary of the English Peace Society; J. Frederick Green, secretary of the English International Arbitration Association; G. H. Perris, secretary of the Cobden Club; J. G. Alexander, secretary of the International Law Association; E. D. Morel, of the Aborigines Protection Society; Percy Alden, of London; Dr. G. B. Clark, of London; W. A. E. Axon, of the Manchester "Guardian"; Rev. Richard Westrope, of York; Rev. Walter Walsh, of Dundee; L'Abbe Pichot, of Monaco; Pastor Charles Wagner, of Paris, author of "The Simple Life"; M. Emile Arnaud, president of the French International League of Peace; Prof. Th.

Ruyssen and M. J. Prudhommeaux, president and secretary of the Association de la Paix par le Droit; Prof. Langlais, of the University of Paris; M. Eugene Reveillaud, member of the French Chamber of Deputies; M. Houzeau de Lehaie of the Belgian Senate; Dr. Adolph Richter, president of the German Peace Society; Prof. Hoffman, of Stuttgart, member of the German Reichstag; Herr Alfred H. Fried, of Berlin, editor of the "Friedenswarte"; Herr Edward de Neufville, of the Frankfort Peace Society; Herr Georg Arnhold, president of the Dresden Peace Society; Prof. Quidde, of Munich; Herr Richard Feldhaus, of Gasel; John Lund, member of the Norwegian Parliament; Signor E. T. Moneta, president of the Italian Peace Society; the Marquis of San Giuliano, Signor Alfred, Signor Gerard, and Signor Cerutti, of the Italian Parliament. There will also be delegates from Canada, Mexico and South America.

On Sixth-day evening there will be a festival and dinner with speeches at Horticultural Hall; tickets for the dinner will be sold to all who wish to attend, at $2.00. On one afternoon a reception for the delegates will be given by the Mayor of Boston. The afternoons will be devoted, in the main, to social entertainments and excursions—special excursions being arranged for the delegates, to Cambridge, Concord, Plymouth and the historic points in Boston.

Arrangements have been made with all of the railway lines of the United States east of Colorado and most of the Canadian lines, by which they will sell tickets to Boston and return, for those coming to attend the Peace Congress, for one fare and a third. Those coming from the Pacific Coast may secure St. Louis Fair rates to St. Louis or Chicago, and thence the reduced rates to the Congress. When the ticket is purchased, which should be at least twenty minutes before departure, the ticket agent will give the passenger a certificate, which must be signed in Boston at the Peace Congress Bureau, and by the agent of the railroads at 67 Federal Street. Upon presentation of the certificate thus signed, a return ticket may be purchased at one-third the regular fare. Tickets for Boston will be issued from Ninth month 29th to Tenth month 5th. The return journey must be begun not later than Tenth month 11th. The Boston hotels of every rank are well known. Any preferring boarding or lodging houses may inquire at the Congress headquarters at Tremont Temple upon arrival, or address the Peace Congress Committee, 20 Beacon Street, Boston.

All peace and arbitration societies, and all religious, educational, philanthropic, industrial, or commercial organizations in sympathy with the general aims of the Congress are entitled to send delegates, and are invited to do so; and any individual friend of the cause may join the Congress upon payment of $1.00. All are requested to secure cards at the Congress headquarters early, or by mail in advance—and this is especially recommended—from the Congress Committee.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

This assembly convened at Damascus, Ohio, at 10 a.m., Eighth month 25th, under a precious sense of the divine presence. After an hour spent in prayer, praise and testimony, the usual routine business was taken up, credentials of visiting ministers were read, and the epistles from London and Dublin, which seemed marked with an unusually spiritual tone, were listened to.

The visiting ministers this year were Leanna Hobson, Minnie Bassett, Oliver M. Frazer and Lucy Johnson from Indiana Yearly Meeting; Rebecca Flagler, Edgar L. Requa and Frank H. Clark from Western; Jonathan B. Wright from Wilmington, and Edgar J. Sanders and wife (missionaries) from Iowa Yearly Meeting. All these had acceptable and helpful service.

For many years the sessions of this yearly meeting have been marked by a more earnest and intense evangelistic spirit than those of most other yearly meetings, more or less of definite work being always done in the conversion of sinners and the sanctification of believers. The same spirit largely pervaded the meeting this year. There was much less noisy and questionable demonstration than last year, but there was much searching of heart among the ministers and workers, and an all-absorbing desire for purity and perfectness of heart and life. It is a great blessing to any yearly meeting to have the spiritual interests of its members always in the foreground, and to have leaders who are livingly concerned to see that this is the case. It not only facilitates the (so-called) business of the church, but it imparts to it a peculiar sacredness which endears it to the hearts of the members. It also sends back the members to their various fields and services with renewed spiritual strength and fervor. The yearly meeting which overlooks or lightly treats this important feature of its work, greatly wrongs its subordinate meetings and its individual members.

The statistical report indicated a small decrease in numbers. It was claimed, however, that this showing was due to statistical errors both this year and last, and that in each of these years there had been a gain instead of a loss. To secure a more perfect report in the future, it was decided to appoint a statistician, whose duty it should be to obtain uniform and accurate reports from the subordinate meetings.

Loving tributes were paid to the memories of Judith C. Johnson and Sarah Healey, ministers, and Sarah Hathaway, an elder, all of whom had deceased within the past year.

Evangelistic labor during the year had resulted in thirteen hundred recorded conversions.

The Friends' Bible Institute and Training School had had a prosperous year, and though not under the care of the yearly meeting received the encouragement of that body. A committee was appointed, whose duty it should be to visit that institution, examine its work, and report to the yearly meeting.

The Educational Committee urged upon the trustees of our academies the importance of knowing by careful examination the religious experience and beliefs of persons employed by them as teachers; and parents were urged to use their best endeavors to secure for the public schools teachers who believe the Scriptures and who are experimental Christians.

The Board to which was entrusted the location of a college, reported it had agreed to accept the offer of the property at Hudson, Ohio, formerly occupied by Western Reserve College, provided sufficient funds could be raised to repair and improve the property, and to insure running expenses for a term of ten years. Having failed to approximate the sums required, the Board asked the direction of the yearly meeting.

There was a large expression in favor of continuing the effort for the Hudson property, and about two thousand dollars were voluntarily subscribed for that purpose. There was, however, such a manifest want of unity upon the subject that at a later session the Board reported unfavorably to a continuation of the effort, and asked to be released. The request was granted.

The result of this action was, presently, a more general and more enthusiastic expression than ever before in favor of a college. A new Board was appointed, invested with all the powers of the former Board, and consisting of three members at large and three from each of the six quarterly meetings. The cause has probably suffered no loss through the apparent failure of last year's effort.

The subject of Foreign Missions, in which this yearly meeting has taken a marked interest, is more dear than ever to the hearts of the members. The burden of this people is a burden for souls. This is manifest in all its work. The reports from the missions in China and India and Africa were interesting and encouraging, though the year has not been without its fresh difficulties and trials of faith.

The religious services this year were not so exclusively evangelistic as they generally have been, but were highly instructive and helpful to the church. The salvation of the children was a prominent theme, and its treatment by different speakers will doubtless have large results. Few persons seem to know much about this subject or to realize its importance.

Many hearts have been moved to earnest prayer for the preservation of boys and girls from the snares everywhere laid for them by immoral men and women. The addresses of Mrs. Edholm on "The Traffic in Girls" have opened the eyes of many to the importance of this subject.

Conspicuous among the blessings enjoyed by the yearly meeting have been the presence and labors of Arthur T. Pierson, the justly renowned advocate of missions, and advocate of evangelical orthodoxy. His sermon, First-day morning, on the plan of salvation was based on Rom. 6: 14: "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace," and was remarkable for its perfect simplicity, its logical clearness and force, and its unction. Not less instructive and impressive was the sermon in the evening on the final stage in redemption. His missionary address and other services were also inspiring.

The meeting closed on Fourth-day afternoon, under a deep sense of the lovingkindness of our heavenly Father, and with a general longing better to fulfill His pleasure in all things.

It had been previously decided to meet next year at the usual time in Columbus, Ohio, if the Lord permit.

CAMBRIDGE.

Some of the sufferings of the people off god (Called quakers) by the scollers and the Rude and blood thirsty people off this towne and universitie off Cambridge, breiffly Related as followeth.

Vpon the 8th day off the 2nd month Called Aprill, 1660, the scollers (who are taught but not off the lord) with other Rude people brake violently upon us into our owne hired house with a malicious spirit, and a Cruell intent in there hearts, as did appeare by there Cruelly beatinge of us and drawinge of our blood and drawinge off severall off us out by the haire off the head, haueinge Regard neither to old or younge men, or women with Child, but did uery much abuse them by tearinge there Cloathes, tumblinge and moileinge diuers in the nasty and loathsome Channells in the streets; and this did the scollers and the Rude multitude unto us, att our meetinge.

Vpon the 13 off the third month followinge (Called may), the unruly scollers and the Rude people came to our owne hired house, and uiolently brake open seuerall doores thereoff, and brake the lockes and bolts with a great hammer, and when our meetinge was ended, we, passinge away to our seuerall outward habitations, was most shamefully abused by the Rude Scollers and the wicked people, seuerall hundreds standinge in the streets, some beatinge off vs, others Rejoyceing to se us beaten, and neuer a magistrate appeared to suppress these wicked actions, but Alderman Blackly, which could not pacifie the Rude multitude, because they will not obey Justice; and this was done at another meetinge.

Vpon the 20th of the same month, the disorderred Scollers, which is a shame to there seuerall tutors, who joined themselues with the worst of men, Came in with one off the Constables, who came under a pretence to search us for Armes, and searched some of vs and found a bible in a freinds pocket but noe armes; and then the rude multitude did fall uiolently upon us and drew some off us out by the haire off the head, and pulled and haled most off the Rest and punched some, insomuch that for a tyme they were in danger off their liues, whither they would Recover yea or nay; this was att another meetinge. Vpon the 27 off the same month, the blood thirsty men and scollers did joine themselves together with a murderous intent and purpose in there hearts towards us, and Came desperatly and uiolently in vpon us, seuerall scores iff not hundreds, and some with sticks, and strucke freinds on the heads faces and hands, A Justice off peace beinge in the Roome and saw there wickednesse, Charged them in the Kings name severall tymes to be quiet and to keepe the peace, but the scollers and others beinge soe wickedly bent, they neither Regarded the Kings name nor him, although he was a justice, but most wickedly went and gott a smiths great hammer, and brake open 4 doores and brake a wooden window, and tooke peices of the boards and beat us with them in our owne hired house and drew us out into the streets and there knocked seuerall of us downe and drew the blood or spilled off 24 of us or more, insoemuch that it was seene in seuerall places in the streets upon the stones; all this beinge done neere the mayors house, he not at all appearinge that day untill this mischeife aboue mentioned was ouer; and then the mayor passinge by the doore to the steeple house and the Shreiffe Cominge with him, they made a stand att the doore off our meetinge house; and the shreife viewed the hauocke that the Rude multitude had made in the house, and went out and made proclamation for all to depart upon the perrill that should fall there on. Yett soone after they were passed away the Rude multitude came in againe and fell to worke, as if some carpenters had beene att worke, pullinge most off the staires downe, soe that we could not gett up into the Chamber, and brake most off the glasse that was aboute the meetinge house, and did much wronge to ye house.

And those wicked Riotous persons followed freinds to the townes end; and in a most unreasonable and unmercifull brutish manner beatinge and stoneinge off us all the way, soe that uery few escaped from Receiuinge much wronge done unto there bodies, and some they hield, while others put durt in there mouths. And afterwards as we were passinge through the streets they stabbed two women privatly, the one being an aldermans wife in the towne, the othere a widow woman; and yet to this day euery first day haue they come in a most sauage manner, seeking for to destroy us; and the major [mayor] of ye towne being willing to grattifie the wicked people and scollers causes people to stand in the streetes to stop friends from there owne hired house.

Heare all may see what moudie waters this fountayne of Cambridge streams forth.

And we whose names are under written doth owne good an wholesome lawes, and godly learned ministers who doth serue the liuing god and not there owne bellies; and he who ministers frely unto those who are heires of salvation, those we loue and allow of, with the rest of all true christians, and we hope we shall do for ever, and if man heare not our complaint, the lord of heuen and earth will.

THIRD QUARTER.

LESSON XIII.

NINTH MONTH 25, 1904.

REVIEW.

Read Psalm 103: 1-12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord is merciful and gracious.—Psalm 103: 8.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Ninth mo. 19.—The kingdom divided. 1 Kings 12: 1-20.

Third-day, Ninth mo. 20.—Jeroboam's idolatry. 1 Kings 12: 25-33.

Fourth-day, Ninth mo. 21.—Asa's good reign. 2 Chron. 14: 1-15.

Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 22.—Wicked kings. 1 Kings 16: 23-33.

Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 23.—Elijah victorious. 1 Kings 18: 20-46.

Seventh-day, Ninth mo. 24.—Encouraged. 1 Kings 19: 1-21.

First-day, Ninth mo. 25.—Translated. 2 Kings 2: 1-11.

The period covered by the lessons of the Third Quarter is from 937 B.C. to about 851 B.C., or not quite a century. The lesson from Amos, of course, is regarding a later period, but essentially the same in character, as the East has always changed very slowly.

The lesson taught by the selections studied is the one emphasized by the whole of the Old Testament, which is, that those who serve the Lord are blessed, and those who forsake Him suffer, and if they persist in their course are punished and finally rejected. The history is one both of encouragement and of warning, and is an admirable illustration of the New Testament words, "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our instruction, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." In "The Kingdom Divided" we see how reasonable requests rejected stir up strife, bring about division and lead to idolatry. In "Jeroboam's Idolatry" a legitimate result follows from separation, and shows how policy alone often brings about sin. In "Asa's Good Reign" the lesson is taught that much good always follows a genuine effort after reformation and a return to that which is right, and when reliance is placed on the Lord the result is always blessed. "Jehoshaphat's Reform" shows that "when one truly repents he does his utmost to repair the damage he has done." In the story of "Omri and Ahab" we have the reverse of that of Asa and Jehoshaphat; it shows also how much ability to work evil rests with those who are in places of power and influence. "God Taking Care of Elijah" is a beautiful illustration of how God takes care of those who put their trust in Him. The story of Obadiah and Elijah shows that one may live a righteous life even when surroundings are most unfavorable. In "Elijah on Mount Carmel" the power of the Lord is shown and the failure of the followers of Baal manifested. It teaches that a decision must be made, and that now, as then, it must be between righteousness and unrighteousness, between the flesh and the spirit, between Baal and the Lord. In "Elijah Discouraged" we see indeed how even good men become discouraged and cast down, but we see also that "God never forsakes His people in the hour of trial" if they put their trust in Him. In "Elijah Encouraged" we see how that God gives new visions of Himself, that He has more than one way of carrying out His plans, and above all that the highest revelation of God is not in the storm, in the whirlwind, in the fire, in the earthquake, but in the still small voice of His spirit in the heart. We also see that one of the best remedies for depression is something to do. We are not to wait for something startling, but are to seek to do God's will in every-day affairs of life. In "Elijah Taken Up" we see the close of a wonderfully picturesque, eventful and remarkable life. Elijah, as it has been pointed out, was a mysterious man as to his life; he was a man of tremendous passions; he was a prayerful man; he was a man of strong self-control, but he was intensely human, for he had his times of weakness; he was "a man of like passions with us," and we can see was tempted as ordinary men are tempted, but we can also see, for our comfort, that he conquered temptation. In "Israel Reproved" the prophet Amos, who lived long after Elijah, brings a message of woe to Israel, but also a message of encouragement: "Seek ye the Lord, and ye shall live." It is never too late to repent if the heart honestly turns to the Lord and turns the back on sin. We see, also, that it is righteousness which really exalts a nation and not material prosperity or power. "Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live: and so the Lord of Hosts shall be with you."

The eyes of the world are turned to Japan to-day, and we read almost with amazement of the doings of this youngest of all the nations in her conflict with the giant Russia. For it is essentially a new nation, sprung from the self-sacrificing of the feudal chiefs of but a few years ago, when their conception of national interest led them to withdraw into private life that the emperor might truly rule a united people. The closing decade of the last century saw the foreign commerce of the Island Empire nearly treble in value, while the spread of knowledge and intellectual culture has been almost as rapid.

Hardly less rapid have been the changes in the religious conditions of the nation. A returned missionary said in the Ecumenical Conference in 1900: "In the briefest period Christian missions in Japan have illustrated the various phases of the foreign work—opposition, success, hesitation, and even reaction. Ten years ago it seemed as if the nation would turn to the living God at once, but now such glorious success seems afar off. Yet surely God's blessing is with all true-hearted work, and in Japan none may say that the gospel has not brought forth a fruitage rich and full."

Japan has shown herself a religious nation, yet the influx of Western learning has shaken the belief in the old faiths, and the struggle is now between agnosticism and Christ. The gospel of force and material prosperity has been preached by the armies and traders of the so-called Christian peoples, and the Japanese have shown themselves apt pupils. We can but wait with prayerful earnestness for the outcome of the present war to know what attitude they will hold toward a gospel of love after the deadly struggle with the champions of one of the great churches of Christendom.

Christians there are in army and civil position, as well as in the schools, and the duty of the Church is to multiply her offerings in the time of new adjustments and new opportunity that is sure to come, even in the face of new difficulty.

Korea may become politically yet more closely related to Japan in case of her ultimate success, yet their conditions are likely to remain dissimilar. The "Hermit Nation" was first successfully reached by medical work, and it was doubtless the pledge of royal favor toward the Korean Hospital that held the ground during some years of popular hostility; but twenty years have made great changes in this little realm of twelve millions of people, an increase from 800 to 5,000 professed converts being reported in a given area within four years. Young men who had disdained the thought of manual labor sought opportunities for work to enable them to procure a Christian education, and have themselves become leaders of groups of native followers of Christ.

"THE BRUMANA CONFERENCE."

"I have heard people speak of giving the plain gospel, but after more than twenty years on the foreign field the 'good news' intrusted to us grows more and more wonderful to me. We can give the gospel in plain words, but let us never speak of it as the 'plain gospel.'" Thus spake G. M. Machie, in the closing service of the conference of foreign missionaries held at Brumana, Syria, from 2d to the 7th of Eighth month, 1904. Then he reviewed the many phases of the work as discussed during those days, and showed that the ultimate aim of it all was to "Glorify our Master, Jesus Christ, that He may be the first-born among many brethren" (Rom. 8: 29), and the hearts of the hundred and eighty-nine missionaries present responded, Amen.

The great theme of the conference was, "The Message and its Messenger."

The missionary gospel was treated under the following heads: Salvation, Sainthood and Service.

The missionary was discussed as a student, as an evangelist, as a fellow-worker, as a social being, and as a man filled with the spirit of God.

The meetings were held under a canopy on the top of the Lebanon Mountains.

Each morning there was a sunrise prayer meeting, which was attended by almost all the members of the conference, and together we realized the precious feeling which comes when a body of worshipers meet their Lord. Throughout the day every meeting began and closed with a short season of silent prayer.

Some of the things that impressed one who was attending this conference for the first time were:

1. The presence, earnestness, wisdom and charity of the gray-haired men and women who have been laboring in Syria for thirty and forty years.

2. The zeal of many sons and daughters of missionaries who have taken up the work that has been so faithfully carried on by their parents.

3. The lines of service that seem to be best established in this field are: Educational, Medical and Press.

4. The Christian Endeavor and Sabbath School are yet in their infancy. This year the "Model Constitution" and "Year Book" for the Christian Endeavor Societies were published in Arabic, and next year the International Sabbath School Lessons will appear for the first time in the Arabic dress.

5. The work done for the insane is receiving God's blessing. In the four years since the hospital was opened three hundred patients have been received and seventy have been sent home cured.

We hope Christians everywhere will pray for Syria and Palestine. The light shines dimly where it once shone bright.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Zeno H. Doan and wife are to continue their labors another year at Danville, Ind.

Dr. Richard H. Thomas continues much the same. It would be a pleasure to us to report an improvement in his condition.

H. Orville Jones has received the unanimous request of the Friends of Valley Mills, Ind., to remain with them for another year.

William P. Angell has been requested to remain as pastor in New Castle Friends' Meeting another year, and has accepted.

Friends who desire to secure board and lodging during Indiana Yearly Meeting may apply to Robert W. Randle, 1132 Main Street, Richmond, Ind.

Benjamin Cody has written, and published at Newmarket, Ontario, "A Short Account of the First Settlement of Friends in Canada." It is an interesting story, and we hope to have more to say of it later.

A. Edward Kelsey writes from Palestine: "THE AMERICAN FRIEND comes with a live message to us from week to week, which is much needed now that we are deprived of many of the privileges of the homeland."

Danville Quarterly Meeting was held at Mill Creek, Ind., Ninth month 3d and 4th. Sylvester Newlin was in attendance, and was favored with messages of life and power. David Hadley and family have lately moved to Danville.

Willis Bond has gone from Watseka, Ill., to Mooresville, Ind. The Friends of Watseka gave a double reception the first of this month to bid farewell to Willis Bond and to welcome Curtis Aye, who is coming among them. Willis Bond was presented with a beautiful library chair.

Irving King, now of Brooklyn, N. Y., received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Chicago University on Ninth month 2d.

Dr. Robert Warder, of Washington, D. C., has been prevented by illness from returning to his duties at Howard University, where he has for some years been a professor. He has felt obliged to resign his position, and is living at present at Holmesburg, Pa.

The following Friends were appointed by New England Yearly Meeting as delegates to the International Peace Congress in Boston: Timothy B. Hussey, North Berwick, Maine; Augustine Jones, Newton Highlands, Mass.; Rufus M. Jones, Haverford, Pa.; Mary E. Miars, Lynn, Mass.; Charles Sisson, Providence, R. I.; Sarah J. Swift, Worcester, Mass.; Thomas Wood, Dorchester, Mass.

Sterling Quarterly Meeting was held at Sterling, Kansas, Eighth month 26th to 28th, 1904. The congregation was small, but the meeting throughout was one of special favor. One reason for the small representation from the other meetings was the death of one of our aged members, funeral taking place during quarterly meeting. Josiah Butler, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, was present, and gave valuable teaching on Seventh- and First-days. On Seventh-day evening a session on education was held. No visiting ministers were present.

The Friends' Tract Association of London is publishing, from time to time, a series of little booklets on "Friends, Ancient and Modern," which sell for one penny. Six of these little biographies have already appeared, viz., George Fox, Samuel Bowley, Elizabeth Fry, Stephen Grellet, Peter Bedford and Thomas Chalkley. The latest of the series to appear thus far is "Thomas Chalkley, Minister and Mariner," by Joseph Taylor, former missionary in India. These little books are within the reach of everybody, and are well worth reading.

Here is Archdeacon Farrar's estimate of George Fox. It is a letter written to Joseph J. Green in 1889:

"Dear Sir: I have always been deeply interested in Fox. I think that he was a thoroughly sincere, holy, courageous and illuminated man, sent forth of God to be a prophet to his own age, and to recall neglected truths to the memory of his countrymen. Of course, like other prophets, he had his errors and limitations, but he uttered great and memorable truths, and I should like to see a good selection of his utterances with a brief biography.

"Yours very truly, F. W. FARRAR.

At Lynnville, Iowa, on the 30th of last month, occurred the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of John T. Newby and his wife, Martha W. Newby. John T. Newby is 82 years old, and his wife is 71. They were both born in Perquimans County, N. C., and came with their parents to Henry County, Ind., 65 years ago. They were married in meeting at Raysville, Ind. They are Friends, and so have been their ancestors on both sides of the house for many generations. They came to Iowa 26 years ago. To this devoted couple have been born nine children—six sons and three daughters, all of whom are now living, and all were present at the anniversary. The youngest child is now 30 years of age. Besides they raised a grandson whose mother died when he was an infant a week old. All the children are upright citizens, and none have ever joined any other church. These two elderly Friends have always been active and influential members of the church.

A severe blow has come to the Friends at Durham, Maine, in the tragic death of Edwin W. Webber. The deceased was twenty-six years of age, the son of Charles W. and Miriam C. Webber, a birthright member of Durham Monthly Meeting of Friends, and president of the local Christian Endeavor Society. It would be difficult to overestimate the true manliness and Christian character of this young man, of whom it might be said that from his early childhood he sought "first the kingdom of God and His righteousness." His sound judgment and integrity caused him to be highly respected both in business and municipal affairs, and his cheerful and helpful personality made him a favorite of young and old alike. In Second month last his head was injured by a kick from his horse, and although no serious results were apprehended at the time, in a few months his head began to trouble him, and he suffered much from depression. On Eighth month 25th he was missing from his home, and three days later his body was found in the river. During the weeks of mental unrest which preceded his death the patience and sweetness of the deceased were marked, and his friends are sustained in their almost overwhelming sorrow by the assurance that their loved one is sweetly resting in the home which he so desired and strove that all might be prepared to enter.

Penina Hill Wilson sends us the following account of Buffalo Quarterly Meeting, Kansas: "Buffalo, Kansas, Quarterly Meeting was held Eighth month 25th, 26th and 27th, at La Harpe, Kansas. We had the largest attendance at all the sessions, except the meeting on ministry and oversight on Sixth-day afternoon, that we have had in several years. George M. Fortune, of Stark, preached an able sermon Sixth-day evening. Old and young appreciated the Gospel truths as they came from this gifted speaker. His ringing words of truth clothed in good English went straight to the hearts of his hearers. On Seventh-day morning President Edmund Stanley, of Friends' University, came in and stayed till the close of the quarterly meeting. His theme Seventh-day morning was 'Justification of Early Friends' Conduct,' and was appropriate to our quarterly Meeting, and highly valued by the members present. The far larger part of the membership came to the church from the world, and know nothing of Friends' doctrines—that is, the real foundation upon which the church was built. The sermon was especially helpful to all of us. The business session began at 2.00 p.m., and the large amount of business was transacted in unity and harmony. Seventh-day evening Edmund Stanley gave a lecture on 'The Status of War in the Twentieth Century' to a large, appreciative audience. At 11 a.m., First-day, he again spoke to a crowded house. At 3.00 p.m. an adjourned session of the meeting on ministry and oversight was held. At 7.00 p.m. the regular Christian Endeavor meeting. John A. Laughlin led the closing session of the quarterly meeting. All went home feeling that the Lord had blessed us."

Probably never in the memory of Friends in the North of Ireland has there been a feeling of such deep and widespread sympathy as has been evoked by the sad boating disaster on Lough Neagh on the 23d inst., whereby four members of Ulster Quarterly Meeting and two of their friends lost their lives. Of these, John F. and Herbert Green, were the only children of Isaac and Rebecca Green, both of whom are valued members of Belfast Meeting.

John F. Green had just attained his twenty-first birthday, and his brother was two years younger; both had been educated at Lisburn and Sidcot Schools, and Herbert Green was afterwards at Bootham. At Sidcot School they formed the acquaintance of Hugh and Frank Catchpole, from Guernsey, and it was while the latter were spending their holidays with their former schoolmates that the sad occurrence took place. Before leaving their homes, to which they were destined never to return, John F. and H. Green and their two visitors agreed that they should all return from Lakeside (Lurgan) next day and attend a Bible reading in the afternoon, which had been arranged for Arthur Midgley, of Saffron Walden, who was engaged in a mission in Belfast under the auspices of Friends' Adult School.

Alas! when Friends were assembling for that Bible reading some of them heard for the first time the sad tidings.

Many feel it to be a personal loss, for John F. and Herbert Green had endeared themselves to those who knew them; and perhaps still wider is the feeling of the loss to Belfast Meeting, as they had given promise of being useful members of our little section of the church. They both took a great interest in Lisburn School Old Scholars' Association, and John F. Green had lately been appointed treasurer.

The other occupants of the boat were their cousins, Winifred, Frank and Dorothy Green, children of Wm. J. and Susan E. Green, of Lakeside (both of whom are elders in Lurgan Meeting). All three had been educated at Lisburn School, where they were much beloved. Frank Green distinguished himself for his scientific and mechanical ability, while his sisters, Winifred and Dorothy, were winners of exhibitions. The latter was continuing her studies at Denbigh, and had just passed the Oxford senior examination, gaining first-class honors, with distinction in Scripture, though she had only reached the age of sixteen and a half years. Her success in that examination she knew before setting out on the fateful excursion, but a postcard from the head mistress, in which she spoke of her as a credit to her school and country, arrived too late for Dorothy to see.

Winifred Green, the sole survivor of the disaster, has lately been studying at Westfield College, London, and intended presenting herself for the London B.Sc. degree in the autumn. Happily she is making satisfactory progress towards recovery, after the wonderful mental and bodily strain to which she was subjected.

The Friends' Meeting House at La Harpe, Kansas, was dedicated Eighth month 28th. Edmund Stanley, president of Friends' University, had charge of the services. He gave a very helpful sermon, his subject being, "By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them." Starting with the statement that religion is inherent in the human family, he spoke of the fruit of the religions of the world, comparing them with Christianity. Priests and creeds are not the makers of religion, but the result of man's religious nature trying to find an avenue of worship. La Harpe Friends now have a nice frame building free of debt. On the preceding evening President Stanley gave a lecture on "The Status of War in the Twentieth Century."

An educational conference of the Friends' academies of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings was held at Indianapolis, Eighth month 16th and 17th. Representatives from the following academies were in attendance: Central, Plainfield, Ind.; Fairmount, Fairmount, Ind.; Bloomingdale, Bloomingdale, Ind.; Vermillion Grove, Vermillion Grove, Ill.; Union High, Westfield, Ind.

The officers elected were: Morris E. Cox, Westfield, president; Leon L. Tyler, Fairmount, secretary. The following program was carried out:

Third-day, Eighth month 16th, 8.00 p.m.—Business meeting; discussion, "What Are Your Three Greatest Needs?" Answered for Spiceland (not represented); for Central, by C. M. Hobbs, president Board of Trustees; for Fairmount, by Ancil E. Ratliff, president Board of Trustees; for Bloomingdale, by Principal Andrew F. Mitchell; for Vermillion Grove, by Principal Frank H. Clark; for Union High, by Principal Irvin Stanley. Informal discussion; miscellaneous business.

Fourth-day, Eighth month 17th, 10.00 a.m.—Devotional; "The Development of the Friends' Academies," Principal C. E. Cosand, Plainfield, Ind.; discussion; "Reciprocal Relation of the Friends' Academies and Earlham College," President Robert L. Kelly, Earlham College; discussion; "Relation of the Academies to Public Education," Principal Leon L. Tyler, Fairmount, Ind.; discussion.

Afternoon Session.—"Endowments: Their Necessity and How they Shall be Obtained," Principal Frank H. Clark, Vermillion Grove; discussion; "Church Loyalty toward the Friends' Academies and the Christian Duty of Patronizing Them," Principal Andrew F. Mitchell, Bloomingdale, Ind.; discussion; report of committees; miscellaneous business; adjournment.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Called together from a sense of our common and mutual needs the representatives of the Friends' academies in Indiana and Illinois recognizing the worth of these institutions as incentives to character and culture, and their maintainance as essential to the perpetuity of the church, do hereby resolve:

1. That it is our duty to keep before the church and community the value of these agencies of higher education; that we strive by every legitimate method to endow and equip these academies for better service, and that we maintain the high Christian and moral standing that will recommend them to bring forth the fruits of character and efficient service.

2. That we request the yearly meeting superintendents of education to allow more time in the sessions of the yearly meetings for the discussion of the academies, their needs and prominence in educational work.

3. That we wish to express our appreciation of the public schools and their work. We are not antagonizing them, but we believe that better opportunity is given in denominational schools for a distinctly religious atmosphere that adds greatly to the development of true character.

4. That we believe that it would be helpful to the church and the academies to have a course of study which shall be as nearly uniform in all the academies as local conditions will permit.

5. That we recommend that a committee be appointed to work out such a course, and report to our meeting next year, keeping in view the fact that about fifty per cent. of our graduates will attend college.

6. That we tender our sincere thanks to the Friends of Indianapolis for the use of their church for these meetings.

Signed: Andrew F. Mitchell, Principal Bloomingdale Academy; C. E. Cosand, Principal Central Academy; Frank H. Clark, Principal Vermillion Grove Academy, Committee on Resolutions.

The conference then voted to hold a meeting next summer, and, on motion, the president appointed as a committee on permanent organization and program for the next meeting, Leon L. Tyler, Principal Fairmount Academy; C. M. Hobbs, President Board of Trustees, Central Academy; Andrew F. Mitchell, Principal Bloomingdale Academy.

President Kelly, of Earlham College, in his talk recommended the toning up of academy courses by increasing the time given to some of the subjects, and not attempting too many lines of work. A committee, consisting of the Principals of the several academies, with President Kelly as chairman, was appointed to arrange a uniform course of study.

The matter of presenting the interests of the academies to the yearly meetings was taken up, and Lewis E. Stout, of Plainfield, was appointed to present it to the Superintendent of Education of Western Yearly Meeting, and Leon L. Tyler to Indiana Yearly Meeting.

The following representatives were in attendance: From Spiceland, no representatives; from Central, C. M. Hobbs, president Board of Trustees; Principal C. E. Cosand, Bertha Carter, and Emery Ratliff, members of the Faculty; from Fairmount, Ancil E. Ratliff, president Board of Trustees; Mrs. Ruth Ratliff, Principal and Mrs. Leon L. Tyler, members of the Faculty; Bloomingdale, Arthur Pickett, member of the Board of Trustees; Principal Andrew F. Mitchell; Vermillion Grove, Principal Frank H. Clark, Laura Hedges, members of the Faculty; Union High, Morris E. Cox, president of the Board of Trustees; Abel Doan, secretary of the Board; Principal Irvin Stanley, A. K. Tomlinson.

Several visitors attended the sessions, and the entire meeting was characterized by a lively enthusiasm, and adjourned with a general all around handshaking and many expressions of appreciation for the good start made.

A PICTURESQUE ARMY.

The American Sunday School Union recently completed its eightieth year's work for the neglected children of our country, and is furnishing the press with some interesting facts. Being an undenominational work, helpful to the churches in every State, its success will give widespread satisfaction.

If we could take all the scholars and teachers who were enrolled in the schools organized by the American Sunday School Union last year, and form them into a column, standing five abreast in ranks, allowing three feet to each rank, in good marching order, we would have

THE DOCTOR'S WIFE

Agrees With Him About Food.

A trained nurse says: "In the practice of my profession I have found so many points in favor of Grape-Nuts food that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all my patients.

"It is delicate and pleasing to the palate (an essential in food for the sick), and can be adapted to all ages, being softened with milk or cream for babies or the aged when deficiency of teeth renders mastication impossible. For fever patients or those on liquid diet I find 'Grape-Nuts and albumen water very nourishing and refreshing.' This recipe is my own idea, and is made as follows: Soak a teaspoonful of Grape-Nuts in a glass of water for an hour, strain and serve with the beaten white of an egg and a spoonful of fruit juice for flavoring. This affords a great deal of nourishment that even the weakest stomach can assimilate without any distress.

"My husband is a physician, and he uses Grape-Nuts himself, and orders it many times for his patients.

"Personally I regard a dish of Grape-Nuts with fresh or stewed fruit as the ideal breakfast for any one—well or sick." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

In any case of stomach trouble, nervous prostration or brain fag, a ten days' trial of Grape-Nuts will work wonders toward nourishing and rebuilding, and in this way ending the trouble. "There's a reason," and trial proves.

a picturesque Sunday School army arrayed in solid phalanx more than eleven miles long.

If we were strong enough to walk eleven miles along this vast host, we would be surprised to see so many bare-foot boys, and girls with calico dresses and sun-bonnets. While plainly clad, most of them have intelligent faces. We would observe they had been supplied with good literature. More than 27,000 Bibles and Testaments might be counted in their hands, also about the same number of song and library books, and many thousand lesson papers.

To review this great Sunday School army, 97,800 strong, which the American Sunday School Union recruited, organized and equipped all in one year, would be an impressive sight. Many decisive battles of the world's history have been gained by a force not so large. To hear this army of children sing would be inspiring and cheering.

CONVERSIONS.

If we should take those who were converted in the Sunday Schools organized by the Society, and stand them side by side, in single file, allowing two feet to each, this line of young converts would reach nearly four miles.

A MILE OF CHURCHES.

The American Sunday School Union has been called the pioneer and recruiting agency for the churches. If we could take all the churches which grew out of Union Bible Schools last year, and stand them end to end, allowing forty feet to each, we would have the imposing sight of a line of churches reaching one mile.

Many of them are neat and tasty, some very plain. Among these 133 new churches may be found many representatives of the various denominations.

OTHER VIEWS.

Imposing as the foregoing columns are, other features of the Union's work are equally as impressive. If we should take all the schools which the Society strengthened during the year, and place them side by side, allowing thirty feet to each, we would have a solid line of Sunday Schools seventy-two miles long.

The multitudes who attended the 450 public addresses delivered each week by missionaries of the Society, and the young people in Union schools who resolved to seek a higher education, would also be an interesting sight.

The men who did this wonderful work would form an interesting procession. The 259 faithful missionaries employed by the Society, some in their little wagons, some on horseback, others on foot, all enduring hardness, to evangelize the destitute.

830 MILES OF HOMES.

During the year missionaries of the Union visited thousands of homes, many of whom have rarely, if ever, been entered by a Christian minister. By words of admonition and circulating good literature secured the hearty co-operation of many parents in the good work.

If we could take these 221,500 homes visited by the missionaries, and place them side by side, allowing twenty feet to each house, we would have a line of homes 830 miles long, extending over hill and valley, further than from Philadelphia, Pa., to Louisville, Ky.

SALIENT POINTS.

1. Vast as this labor was, it should not be regarded as something new or unusual, for the Society is doing substantially as much, year after year, as there are yet about 12,000,000 children and youth in our country who have not been enrolled in any Sunday School; a number larger than all the standing armies of Europe combined, we can readily see how greatly this work should be enlarged.

2. Many communities where these schools were organized will not be able to support churches for years to come. This is all the greater reason why they should now have good Sunday Schools.

3. In perfect loyalty to the churches, the Society provides for the children who are not reached by any other agency. Nothing has been found which takes the place of Bible instruction for establishing noble principles in the minds of the young and uplifting the true standard of morals.

The American Sunday School Union desires to furnish full particulars regarding the method, expense and results of its work.

AT SUNDOWN.

Far more than all I dared to dream,
Unought before my door I see;
On wings of fire and steeds of steam
The world's great wonders come to me,

And holier signs, unmarked before,
Of love to seek and power to save,—
The righting of the wronged and poor,
The man evolving from the slave;

And life, no longer chance or fate,
Safe in the gracious Fatherhood,
I fold o'er-wearied hands and wait,
In full assurance of the good.

And well the waiting time must be,
Though brief or long its granted days,
If Faith and Hope and Charity
Sit by my evening hearth-fire's blaze,

And with them, friends Heaven has spared,
Whose love my heart has comforted,
And, sharing all my joys, has shared
My tender memories of the dead,—

Dear souls who left us lonely here, Bound on their last, long voyage, to whom
We, day by day, are drawing near,
Where every bark has sailing room.

I know the solemn monotone
Of waters calling unto me;
I know from whence the airs have blown
That whisper of the Eternal Sea.
—J. G. Whittier.

"THE WORLD PASSETH AWAY."

It is a solemn truth that "the world passeth away and the lusts thereof."
The very things the world desires and longs for fail to satisfy. They see that change and decay are busy ever. Their fountains of delight are constantly failing. Men grow weary of a profitless quest for happiness. There is no solid assurance save as man's life harmonizes with God's will. "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever."

WHAT'S THE USE

To Keep a "Coffee Complexion."

A lady says: "Postum has helped my complexion so much that my friends say
I am growing young again. My complexion used to be coffee-colored, muddy and yellow, but it is now clear and rosy as when I was a girl. I was induced to try Postum by a friend who had suffered just as I had suffered from terrible indigestion, palpitation of the heart and sinking spells.

"After I had used Postum a week I was so much better that I was afraid it would not last. But now two years have passed and I am a well woman. I owe it all to leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place.

"I had drank coffee all my life. I suspected that it was the cause of my trouble, but it was not until I actually quit coffee and started to try Postum that I became certain; then all my troubles ceased, and I am now well and strong again." Name furnished by Pos-

CHARLES WAGNER.

The visit of M. Charles Wagner to this country marks an important and interesting stage in his career. To recapitulate the chief features of it thus far: He was born about fifty years ago in Alsace, of a long line of humble, pious Protestant ministers, and was in natural succession also dedicated to the Church. After a preliminary education in his village school, supplemented by a course of classical and religious lessons from the village pastor, he was sent straight from his green fields and pastures, from his country home, companions, amusements, occupations, thought and talk, to Paris, there to make a beginning of his theological studies under an Alsatian compatriot and theologian. He remained in Paris six years; went thence to Strassburg, where he was studying for his degree when the Franco-Prussian war wrested his country and his people from their allegiance and transferred them by the point of the sword to Germany. Feeling that he could not thus be transferred, when the time came for him to fix the place of his home and his work, he selected France.

The Southern Railway operates through personally-conducted Excursion Sleepers from Washington to Los Angeles and San Francisco without change, via Atlanta, New Orleans and El Paso, leaving Washington at 9 p.m., every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The berth rate in these sleepers is only $8.50 to Pacific Coast points, two people being allowed to occupy one berth if desired. There are other new, convenient and economical features connected with these sleepers, which may be ascertained from Charles L. Hopkins, District Passenger Agent, Southern Railway, 828 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

With his bride, a young Alsatian like himself, he settled in a small village within the French border line, and for several years maintained the traditions of his family by fulfilling the simple but onerous duties of a village pastor.

Intellectual necessities, perhaps such as his pastoral ancestors had not known, and a spiritual energy such as perhaps may never have disquieted them, drove him from what was his predetermined field of labor, to Paris, where he sought a mission for himself and found one in the Faubourg St. Antoine.

Perhaps not in Christendom could a field of missionary work have been found of rockier soil, of thornier growth, of more unwholesome atmosphere. The difficulties to be overcome attracted, however, rather than repelled the stalwart young pastor; the vision of the harvest to be gathered one day from it, inflamed his heart with the enthusiasm that makes of the labor itself the reward of the laborer. Wagner put his hand to the plow in that field, and he is still tracing furrows in it.

For years his only chapel was an upper room, No. 2 Rue des Arquebusiers. Here, seed by seed, was stored the precious grain saved from the tares of humanity that grow rank and wild in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Here, one by one, was brought, not the one that was lost, but ninety and nine that were lost out of every hundred. Here week-day lectures, Sunday services, Sunday School, night and day classes for young men, classes for young women, and the many and various charitable and religious organizations that naturally ensue from sincere and active church membership, are now rooted and growing vigorously in that once spiritually abandoned spot of Paris.

The enlargement of the little salle de la Rue des Arquebusiers into the Eglise Boulevard Beaumarchais has also followed in natural order. M. Wagner, in his coming lectures, will doubtless speak of the historical and social conditions that he had to contend with in his round of labors; of the various and heterogeneous elements of humanity, ranging up to the intelligent workman and down to the bestialized drone and vicious criminals of both sexes that he had to work with.

The books he has published are a part of the harvest he has gathered from this field: "Youth," "Justice," "Courage," "Around the Hearthstone," "The Better Way," "The Simple Life," "The Friend"; as also are the innumerable addresses and papers read before different meetings for the advancement of the cause of popular education, moral action and social reform.

From the Faubourg St. Antoine his influence has spread over Paris and France. He is at present the leader of liberal Protestantism in France, and as such has answered recently the series of letters published in "Le Protestant," entitled, "Free Thought and Liberal Protestantism," written by M. F. Buisson, one of the leaders of French free thought, who with great ability endeavored to prove that favorite conclusion of both the French Catholic and infidel—the identity of liberal Protestantism with rationalism. ("Libre Pensée et Protestantisme," par F. Buisson et Charles Wagner. Fishbacher, Paris.)

M. Wagner has written no finer, nobler pages than in these letters that contain his own profession of faith and the manifesto of French liberal Protestantism, which although united with workers of all degrees of free (or shackled) thought in all good effort for sociological and educational improvement inaugurated of recent years in France, and fighting as it does in the ranks of the anti-clerical party for freedom of church and school, yet in no wise severs itself from its religious authority or denies its divine commission.

What differentiates the liberal Protestant from the Freethinker, says M. Wagner, is faith in God. "As for this vocable God, against which you have so many reservations to present, I recog-

No. 38.

THE VALUE OF WANTING.

THE first weeks of a little baby's life are mainly spent in sleep. The great ministries of life are wrought for it while it lies in slumber. The forces of growth are working away, as silently as the fall of a snowflake, while the recipient is unconscious. God gives, as of old, to His beloved in sleep.

But this passive state must not be pushed too far. It is only one side of the little creature's life. Occasionally he wakes up. And then he is not passive. He makes his wants known. He insists on having them attended to. These very life processes which have been going on in silence make a new supply of food necessary. There is a strange feeling of lack which disturbs the whole system. He does not know what he wants. He can not describe his sense of lack. But he is made so that he can announce it in a good vigorous cry.

When this surging cry rises out of his deep, nothing will hush it. It is useless to bring in the rattle or to sing pretty lullabys, or to try to divert him from the main issue. The want of his whole being goes into his cry, and no substitutes will do now. His attention may be arrested for a moment, but immediately the old demand rises again, stronger and firmer than ever. The result is, he gets what he wants!

The babe and the suckling has his lesson for us. Christ was continually emphasizing the value of wanting, hungering, thirsting, knocking, seeking, asking. He compared the kingdom of heaven to a city which must be taken by violent siege. He tells us that everything is possible for the determined soul that refuses to let go until the blessing comes.

The craving hunger for eternal things is in us all. We have our sense of lack as surely as the waking baby has. "We are made for God, and our hearts are restless till they rest in Him." We know that we cannot feed our own souls, and we "come to ourselves" and discover that we are perishing with hunger. But we lack the baby's persistence. We cry out for a short minute. We send up an eager prayer for that which we need to give us life, but if it does not come at once we are too apt to fall back on substitutes. We try the world's old ways of lulling a spiritually hungry soul. The rattle and the lullaby work this time—i.e., they make the soul forget its native hunger. But they work only disaster.

The prevailing soul is the one which will not stop crying until the true food of the soul comes. The world is well supplied with easy ways for deadening the passion for the eternal. But alas for him who yields to the attraction of the substitute, who tries to still an immortal soul on some near-at-hand sugar plum.

The main difference in men lies here. In one class are those who are hushed with pleasure or success, or riches or culture, who stop the great quest mid-way because they have found some half-good which quiets them for the moment. In the other class are those who will slacken no jot until they win the final good for which their whole being cries out, who press on with the violence of a besieger, with a determination like that of a hungry child, until the blessing for which they have wrestled is won.

A SETBACK IN MAINE.

WHILE the great party managers are figuring out whether the Maine election forecasts the triumph of the Republican or the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, those of us who care more for moral issues than for party issues find in this election small comfort. In two of the counties—Cumberland and Androscoggin—the great contest was upon the election of a sheriff. In both these counties the issue was sharply drawn. On one side stood a man who was out and out for the enforcement of the prohibitory law; on the other a man known to be in favor of nullifying this law. Sheriff Cummings, of Androscoggin County, who for two years has made a heroic effort to enforce the law, delivered a great speech just before election, from which we quote:

The issue is clearly drawn this year, more clearly than it was two years ago. Then my opponent was a gentleman who had early announced that he would faithfully enforce the liquor law, and many Democrats voted for him who would not have voted for him had they not believed he stood for all the Republican candidate stood for. But such is not the fact this year. The issue is clearly drawn. The opposition make no pretense to anything else. The question, stripped of all disguises, is whether there shall be an honest, faithful administration of the sheriff's office and the continued enforcement of the liquor law without collusion or bribery, or, whether this administration shall be turned down for open rum shops, run with the knowledge and consent of the sheriff, and with all the consequent train of evils when law and constitution and solemn oath are violated and officials are in collusion with law-breakers. Let there be no confusion or confounding of the issue. The law is not the issue; it is its administration. It is the simple question whether you want your own law respected, or whether you want it violated.

I have been told on what conditions I could have the vote of the county. If I would make a deal I could have that vote. But I have not and I will not. I will be true to you even in defeat, but I will not be false to you for any victory that could be won. If decent people cannot stand by a decent administration then let it be defeated. There can be no bitterness in a defeat on the platform upon which I stand. There could be no satisfaction in a victory won at the expense of integrity and manhood. You have infinitely more at stake in this election than I have. I have only the cares of the office and the responsibilities and duties that go with it. But you citizens have the honor and reputation of the county; the integrity of law; the stability of society and the common welfare. Are you ready to trade this off for anything to be gained by a victory for the saloon?

Nothing could be more straightforward and manly. And on that platform, Sheriff Cummings has been defeated. In Cumberland County, in which Portland is situated, the defeat is also sharp and decisive. There, the present sheriff is against enforcement, and his policy has been supported by a reelection. This is one more chapter in the complicated story of the Maine law, where the enforcement of the law of the State depends on the prevailing sentiment of a county, a sentiment which is almost as shiftily as New England weather. We can discover no comfort in these returns; they show a very low comprehension of the majesty of law, and they indicate that the struggle still before us is a very long one.

THE DEATH OF FRANCIS WHITE.

It will be sad news to many of our readers to hear that Francis White, of Baltimore, has passed beyond. Ever since the great Baltimore fire, which was a great shock to him, he has been slowly failing, until First-day morning, the 11th inst., when his life came to a peaceful end.

He was a native of North Carolina, but his great business career began when he came to Baltimore, where he was very successful in acquiring this world's goods. During the great revival in Baltimore, under the leadership of D. L. Moody, Francis White became deeply interested, and he was among the foremost in promoting the work of that evangelist. From that time on his interest in religious work has steadily deepened. Though through and through a Friend, he was always glad to help on any lines of work which would advance the kingdom of heaven.

His largest public service was in educational fields. He was one of the original trustees of Johns Hopkins University and Hospital, and he contributed generously toward the million dollar fund which was raised two years ago. He had been for many years a manager of Haverford College, and he was a liberal contributor to many other Friends' institutions.

He was a quiet, retiring man, unassuming in his manner, but with wide interests, and marked by real devotion to the causes which were near his heart. Few Friends were more appreciative than he of the work done by THE AMERICAN FRIEND, and his encouragement to it is a pleasant memory.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

WILLIAM G. HUBBARD wishes to make up a list of books which are especially helpful for those who are called to the ministry, and who are engaged in active religious service. He wishes to have those who have been helped by their reading send him the names of the books that have helped them most, including name of publisher and price of book. We hope many will respond to his request. From the answers received he will make up a small library of the most helpful books which can be bought for one hundred dollars. His address is Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

THE FRUITS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

A bountiful crop of weeds will always grow spontaneously on any neglected piece of ground. In like manner sin is spontaneous in the carnal heart. The Apostle Paul calls the roll of a very ugly brood of what he styles "the works of the flesh" in the fifth chapter of his letter to the Galatians. But wheat and corn must be sown, and orchards must be planted. Wherefore in vivid contrast to the spontaneous products of unregenerate hearts, he specifies certain most beautiful and precious "fruits of the Holy Spirit."

While many talk confidently about man's self-reforming power, yet God's word and human experience make it certain that when men have tried to reach the highest, noblest, purest spiritual life without the aid of God's Spirit, they have lamentably failed. Bible religion is a growth, a development; and it requires a root. That root is of divine origin. The root of the best characters and the best lives is a new spiritual principle implanted by the Holy Ghost. This is the meaning of regeneration. This root is as invisible to the eye as the root of an apple tree; but the tree is visible with its beautiful blossoms in May, and its bountiful fruitage in October. The inward life of the tree overhangs the boughs with innumerable apples, which the sun crimson with its warm blush, and then the "good tree" presents to its owner its "good fruit" as its consummated season's work.

There is a striking analogy between an orchard and the true Christian Church—which is not a monopoly of any single denomination. It is made up of "the faithful in Christ Jesus." Christians are simply converted sinners. They have turned to God under the drawing influence of the wondrous divine love; and the Holy Spirit is the author of their regeneration.

The attempt to take the supernatural out of our religion would be as fatal as the attempt to remove from the skies the light and the life-giving warmth of the sun. God's Word meets every minister as he enters his pulpit, and every teacher or parent who desires the conversion of a child with the emphatic declaration—"With the Holy Spirit everything, without the Spirit nothing!" Every true Christian is "born of the Spirit." He is created anew in Christ Jesus. To the carnal heart sinning is as natural as breathing; the incontestable evidence that the heart is renewed and under a new Master is that it bears the fruits of the Spirit.

Let us go around this goodly tree of Christian character and shake down a few of these apples of gold. The first one specified by the Apostle is Love. It well deserves the pre-eminence. The very essence of Bible piety is to love the Lord our God with all the heart and soul, and our neighbors as ourselves. Our religion ought to be saturated with love; it ought to breathe out in our every-day talk as freely as in our prayers; it ought to ennoble a Christian's business transactions; it ought to write his ballot and sweeten his citizenship; it ought to own his purse and be felt in the grasp of his hand. He that thus loveth is born of God.

The next grace is Joy; and this is as different a thing from mere jollity as the steady sunlight is from the brief flash of the lightning. I have never seen this grace gleam out more brightly than when carried at the prow through a midnight tempest of adversities. A genuine child of Jesus Christ can sing in the dark and "rejoice in tribulation." Can a skeptic or a worldling do that?

Peace is the third in the catalogue of the Holy Spirit's fruits. This is the sweet serenity of a pardoned and accepted soul that has found the "rest" which Christ promiseth. When wicked and wayward selfishness has grounded arms in the citadel of the heart, and surrendered its will as well as its affections, Jesus says to us, "My peace I give unto you." Worries about the transient things and the temporal things ought to be no more disturbing than the ruffings of a light breeze on the surface of the great deep sea.

Long-Suffering and Gentleness are mentioned as twin graces. The literal meaning of the first word is the power of holding still under provocation. It is the rare and beautiful grace of forbearance. Christ Jesus was its loftiest embodiment when He breathed out on the cross that divinest prayer of magnanimity and patience, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

Goodness is philanthropy—the unselfish love of our fellow-men, whatever their caste, color or condition. It is Christianity on foot—with a Bible in one hand and a loaf of bread in the other—food for hungry souls and bodies too. It is not the religion that suns itself on the warm side of a well-endowed church, but the practical Christ-likeness that seeks out the lost, going down in the diving-bell of practical mission work to bring up pearls for Christ's crown out of the slimy depths of ignorance and vice.

But this article is too brief to dwell on all the fruits of the Spirit in a consecrated life. There is Faith that joins the soul to Jesus and overcomes the world; and there is Meekness that chooses an humble place, esteeming others before itself. By no means least comes Temperance, which means self-control for our own sake, and self-denial for the sake of those who might be tempted to their own destruction. Righteous law may prohibit the open haunts of temptation as slaughter-houses for body and soul; but Bible-temperance goes deeper yet, when it forbids the use of that ensnaring beverage which bites like a serpent and stings like a viper. When professed Christianity puts the bottle out of its own house, it is better able to break the bottles of the dram-shop.

What a glorious catalogue of fruits we have been beholding on a well-laden tree of a godly life! What an evidence of the power of Calvary's atoning blood and the gospel of redeeming love! What a proof of the vital and indispensable need of the Holy Spirit in subduing the power of Satan and of sin in the heart, and of producing the genuine and enduring graces that beautify and bless humanity! And what a tremendous argument for fervent and importunate prayer for the outpourings of the Holy Spirit!

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

SOME NOTES OF HISTORIC INTEREST IN RELATION TO LA GRANGE PRE- PARATIVE MEETING.

[Read at the close of the quarterly meeting held at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Ninth month 8th, 1904.]

Samuel Janes Dorland came from Holland in the ship Spotted Cow, in the year 1663, and settled at Hempstead, L. I.; married, and had two sons. One of them came to Dutchess County, N. Y., where he purchased a tract of land in the town then called Beekman. The meeting house ground which we are occupying to-day was a part of this purchase; also the homestead owned by our friend, Anna Dorland Wiley, who is a direct descendant through four generations.

Oswego Monthly Meeting (now called Poughkeepsie) was set off from Nine Partners in Twelfth month, 1799, and has continued to be an established meeting up to the present time.

The meeting at Beekman was held under the care of a committee in the house of Samuel Dorland, Jr., from 1803 until 1809, said committee regularly sending a report of the manner in which it was held, and the spiritual condition of the same.

The monthly meeting makes this minute in 1809: "This meeting proposes the propriety of building a meeting house at Beekman, at a cost of fifty pounds, which meets the approval of the meeting."

The house was accordingly built in 1810.

The monthly meeting at this time embraced four preparative and meetings for worship, viz., Oswego, Appoquage, West Branch and Beekman.

It appears from the records that these meetings were the central places of worship for nearly the whole community at that time. Seldom was a meeting held when there was not a request for membership, or of an intention of marriage laid before the meeting, such intentions passing through two preparative meetings.

It is noteworthy to find that Friends of that day gave liberally of their means, according as God had prospered them, contributing freely of their material goods for the support of those less favored than themselves, remembering the command, "Thou shalt open thy hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor and to thy needy in thy land."

Nine Partners Boarding School then being in its infancy, required much sacrifice to meet the demands for its support, but this being the only Friends' school then accessible, it proved a great blessing to their descendants.

Their proportion of funds for the yearly meeting's use, for the civilization of the Indians under their care, and the assistance which they gave to build seven meeting houses within the limits of the yearly meeting, drew upon the sense of responsibility which they felt to Him who had blessed them with an inheritance for which they had not labored, but which it was their duty to maintain.

When the separation in the Society occurred in 1828, the members of Beekman Meeting remained faithful advocates of the ancient principles, and in this testing time they found a safe refuge in Christ, whom they had confessed before the world as their Saviour and Redeemer.

Their meeting house was retained by Friends, one family only leaving on account of disunity. The quarterly meeting having come to the conclusion that the cause of truth would be promoted by holding one of its sessions in this place, decided to build a larger house for its accommodation, which was done, and the quarterly meeting was held here in Eleventh month, 1838.

Preparative meetings and meetings for worship have been held here continuously, until within the past two years, during which time they have been discontinued on account of local conditions.

The principles of peace were carried out in the lives of these early settlers, and when the War of the Revolution occurred, they refused to bear arms or to contribute in any way to military requirements.

A late historian says of them: "The Quakers were non-combatants, and undergoing the trials and anxieties that attend such catastrophes, were driven from their homes, suffering in person and in property."

One of this number was elected a member of the Canadian Parliament, but refusing to take an oath lost his seat in the House.

While we know that virtue does not come by lineal descent, yet the Lord honors his children who put their trust in Him, and from this ancestral stock there have been many valuable members of our branch of the church, many elders "whom we have esteemed very highly in love for their works' sake;" also six ministers whom we have known personally. One of these was our beloved friend, John T. Dorland.

INTERNATIONAL, INDUSTRIAL AND INDIVIDUAL PEACE.

MEMORIAL.

To My Countrymen, Greeting:

You are hereby respectfully and earnestly memorialized: To prayerfully consider and actively to be felt on the side of both International, Industrial and Individual Peace—especially to the ends of conciliation and arbitration being insisted on to settle warring interests, in place of violence and contention.

The thousands of millions of dollars lost in a war between nations are small beside the wholesale murder and mangling incident to it. All these combined, however, are insignificant compared to the moral evils of war, through many thousands of young men coming out of it full of impurity, intemperance, gambling, ruffianism, profanity, Sabbath breaking, and such like.

Hence, when as now, cause of war has a means of cure through The Hague Peace Court, it is both privilege and duty for Christians, in and out of the pulpit, to persistently and pointedly be heard and felt in favor of all national differences being referred to that court—heard by the subject being made the topic of sermons and at prayer meetings, and of essays and recitations in common schools. Also, the topic in part or in whole of articles in religious and local newspapers; heard by memorials to State and National legislatures; by personal and by collective letters to legislators, and otherwise, as occasion may require, to oppose war as a deadly enemy to the Church of Our Lord.

War, in face of The Hague Court, is well-nigh, it not quite, "Presumptuous Sin"—"Unpardonable Sin," it may be, for which we are measurably individually responsible. Is not the call, therefore, loud to seek to create such public opinion, national and international, as to make International Arbitration practically obligatory—especially also to aid weak nations to get its advantages?

Similar suggestions apply to the Industrial section of this subject. A single strike, in only a portion of one of the United States, has recently cost our country as a whole, in a year, more than the value of the aggregate output of all our American gold and silver mines for that year. But that vast cash cost is insignificant beside the moral loss incident to ideas and methods of violence engendered, and the appalling planting of anarchy for the future. Therefore, there should be no uncertain sound to the imperative demand by Protestant clergy and laity, and the relig-ous press, that quarrels between labor and capital be settled by courts of conciliation and arbitration; and that such courts be sustained by public voice as well as sentiment. Especially as strikes and lockouts, like war between nations, never settle the troubles they relate to, but leave contending elements in worse case at the close than at the beginning.

As a means to the good ends of Industrial Peace, it is hereby respectfully maintained that, as in France, New Zealand, and other countries, there should be a Permanent National Industrial Peace Court in the United States, provided by Congress.

As one means to Industrial Peace, it is hereby suggested and urged that contracts between persons have an arbitration clause, the same in some such form as the following, or its equivalent, to wit: "If any misunderstanding occurs under this contract we agree to settle it by amicable reference to disinterested third parties, and to abide by their decision. This, instead of incurring the expense and arousing the animosities almost sure to arise in litigation before courts of law." As a means to International, Industrial and Individual Peace, there should be a Permanent, Periodic International Congress to consider these good ends, that congress to meet once in five years.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING.

The forty-second annual assembly of Iowa Yearly Meeting was held at Oskaloosa, Iowa, the 6th to the 12th inst. The weather was cool and clear throughout. Upwards of a thousand people attended the various sessions during the first four days. On Sabbath afternoon, which is the time for the great gathering, an orderly crowd, estimated at from seven to eight thousand, was present. The people who came listened to preaching in the upper and lower rooms of the meeting house, and from three stands arranged under the trees on the south part of the grounds. One session was held on Second-day to close the business, but not more than two hundred stayed for this meeting.

The Iowa Yearly Meeting grounds lie in the form of a rectangle, with the meeting house standing near the middle. To the south are trees, to the north is an open yard. In this yard some twenty or twenty-five tents were pitched, in which many families from a distance camped during the "feast." In the midst of these tents was a rough board shack, in which two cook stoves did service for the campers. To the east of the meeting house was the large Christian Endeavor tent, which was decorated inside with numerous banners and other trappings. This served as a place of meeting for early morning prayer and for early evening service; also as a place for various other meetings. In this tent a writing table and news-stand were provided, and some kind Endeavorer was always on hand to give any information desired. Near this tent was a "book tent," where Bibles and other religious books were on sale. Among the trees south of the meeting house was a lunch counter, where refreshments were served at all hours.

The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor held two business meetings before the opening of yearly meeting to review the year's work and to plan how to make themselves useful during the week.

Stephen M. Hadley acted as presiding clerk, Richard R. Newby as reading clerk, Mary H. Lewis as recording clerk, and John H. Hadley as announcing clerk.

The visiting ministers with credentials were S. A. Wood and Lauretta Pim, from Ohio; Richard Hawthorth and Goldie Thompson, from Western, and L. Emory Pearson and Herman Newman, from Kansas Yearly Meetings. Levi Mills, from California, and Wm. G. Hubbard, from Ohio, were present without credentials.

Mary E. White and Sada Stanley, representing the mission work in Jamaica; Zenas L. Martin, from Cuba, representing the interests of the American Friends' Foreign Mission Board, and Dr. B. F. Andrews, from Mexico, contributed to the interest and devotion of the meetings.

The regular meeting for business commenced at 2 p.m., Third-day. A request for a new quarterly meeting to be known as Denver Quarterly Meeting, and to be composed of Denver, Boulder and Paonia Monthly Meetings; also a request for a new quarterly meeting to be known as Smyrna Quarter, and to be composed of Smyrna and High Point Monthly Meetings in Iowa and Chapel Monthly Meeting in Missouri, came up early in the session. The first request was granted, and the times for meeting were fixed as follows: At Boulder, Col., the fourth Seventh-day in Ninth month; at Paonia, Col., in Twelfth month, and at Denver in Third and Sixth months. The second request was placed in the hands of a committee with full power to set up a new quarterly meeting if best to do so, after due investigation.

The request for the establishment of a new yearly meeting, which should embrace the quarterly meetings in Nebraska and Colorado, met with much favor in the yearly meeting. A committee was appointed to have charge of the matter, and to report to the yearly meeting in two years, which will give ample time to bring the matter before the next Five-Years Meeting.

The plan of making a synopsis of the epistles from the several American yearly meetings, and having this synopsis printed in the yearly meeting minutes, as well as reading it in the meeting, was adopted for this year.

Some favored appointing a committee to receive and prepare this synopsis during the time between yearly meetings, but others were dissatisfied, and the matter was left over for consideration next year.

The departmental work of the yearly meeting showed considerable vitality and permanent growth. The evangelistic and church extension work was well organized and kept moving under the general supervision of W. Jasper Hadley, who visited within the limits of every quarterly meeting during the year. In presenting his report he called attention to a number of vital points. He cautioned meetings against selecting emotional speakers as pastors, and exhorted ministers to recognize the voice of God in the mind of the meeting rather than in their personal thought.

There is a net gain of five ministers over the number reported last year, and twenty-six young men and fifteen young women give promise of entering the ministry. Two missionaries for Cuba and one for Japan have been selected from the Iowa Yearly Meeting during the year. The total membership reported for the year was 11,135, a gain of 113 over the number reported last year. The yearly meeting appropriated $800.00 toward this work, and collections amounting to about $225.00 were received.

Much enthusiasm was manifest when the subject of missions was under consideration. The special field for Iowa Yearly Meeting is Jamaica, and the immediate needs are the restoration of places of worship which were destroyed by the hurricane last year, and the erection of a boys' school near Happy Grove School. An excellent tract of land, favorably situated, has been secured at a reasonable price, but the money has not yet been raised to pay for it. Collections and subscriptions amounting to about $1,250 were secured in the meeting to meet these needs. This is in addition to the appropriations for the regular mission work. Last year $326.38 were turned into the Cuban work, $320.00 into the Africa industrial mission work, and $6,201.54 into the Jamaican work. The part taken by the Christian Endeavor in this field should be mentioned. Last year they contributed $900.00 toward the work, and propose to contribute $1,000 during the coming year.

The plea for Jamaica was made by Mary E. White and Sada Stanley. Dr. B. F. Andrews brought greetings from Mexico, and Zenas L. Martin presented the claims of the American Friends' Foreign Mission Board. He is striving to secure help in two ways. First, for the general support of the mission work under the care of the Board, and, second, for a mission building at Holguin. In order to place the first on a firm financial basis until further arrangements can be perfected, he is taking pledges for $10, payable annually for five years. The second he expects to meet by private contributions.

The educational reports from the academies show much solid work done. However, the lack of adequate financial support was felt in all of them. Nebraska Central College had a total enrollment of 70 students the past year. Penn College reported the best year of its history, with an enrollment of 410. President A. Rosenberger spoke of the immediate needs of Penn. A girls' dormitory should be built, and laboratories and lecture rooms should be provided for the college students, since the present building is little more than ample for the academic work. Forty to fifty thousand dollars would be sufficient to meet these needs. The White's Manual Labor Training Institute Fund furnished $1,365.60 for the aid or support of 52 children during the year.

Delegates were appointed to attend the Quinquennial Educational Conference which is to be held at Earlham College next summer. Levi Mills delivered a forceful address on the theme of "Education a Present Necessity for Efficient Christian Ministry."

The reports from the Bible Schools give two home departments and six cradle rolls. Eleven new mission schools were organized, and the total enrollment increased 875 during the year. Joseph Wells, the State organizer of the American Sabbath School Union, gave an account of his trip to the Jerusalem Convention, which was listened to with much interest. More than usual was done by the Peace Committee. J. Howard Brown gave them his services part of the year, and delivered twenty lectures at various points throughout the yearly meeting. He was appointed as delegate to the Peace Convention which is to convene in Boston next month. The reports from the Temperance Committee showed activity in the usual lines. By invitation of this committee, Joseph E. Cowgill, of Indianapolis, spoke to the yearly meeting on "God's Country—America."

A quotation from the summary of the reports from the quarterly meetings will reveal something of the State of Society: "There seems to be an increased interest in family devotion and the Holy Scriptures, though with sadness we acknowledge that many members do not conduct family worship in their homes. We find an earnest zeal among many of our young people to fill their place in the church to the glory of God."

The meetings for worship were mostly of an evangelistic character. In order to enable the teachers in the public schools and the academies to attend the yearly meeting the time for holding it was placed ahead as far as the constitutional provision will allow, so that next year the meeting will convene in adjourned session on the Fourth-day before the first First-day in Ninth month.

Just before the concluding minute a fitting memorial to Charles L. Michener was read. All hearts were touched by the sacred memory of the brother who had served Iowa Yearly Meeting and his fellow-men so nobly. Under this touch of sadness, and with solemn prayer, the meeting adjourned.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

TRUTH VS. IMAGINATION.

BY EZRA LAMBORN.

By the use of the magnifying glass objects are brought closer to our vision and we can view the minute details. A mere retrospective view of some things is sufficient, while in other matters more detail is necessary. From a single outline description we arrive at conclusions which are reversed when the light of truth is brought to bear. The effect depends upon the coloring and the points covered by the magnifier. In one's efforts to advocate right principles to some, he may appear to be radical, and the picture to them may seem to be "overdrawn."

In the light of God's truth we may see the "exceeding sinfulness of sin," and in the light of God's truth we may behold the glory of the light also. Looking constantly at sin produces a dark picture, and brings a cloud over one's own eyes. As the light is upheld the darkness is dispelled. If we fret over a dark day it seems even darker than it really is. The imagination makes it very dark.

Sin should be denounced in all its forms and phases, but that is not the Christian's whole duty. He should not only denounce sin, but uphold something better—hold up a spark of light to a dark world, preach Christ the light and His gospel, as well as rebuke. While it may be possible to detect the slightest inconsistency, it may not be one's duty to pronounce woe upon a thoughtless act, when no evil motive or thought is apparent. It may seem like a gross matter in one's imagination, and yet it may be a greater imprudence to place uncharitable construction upon it.

Acquaintance is the detective of faults. No one is exempt from human imperfections, and the sinner as well as the Christian can see them. Even the "world" can find fault with God's children. Again, the search-light of truth is a renovator and should be turned upon every avenue and recess of sin; but it does not follow that we should be judges and should censure every fault and motive.

One truth, doctrine or theme may be dwelt upon to the obscurity of another perhaps equally important scriptural injunction. The one-theme Christian or hobbyist may focus the light entirely upon one important truth, but not upon the "whole truth," or the whole gospel, which embodies the whole catalogue of doctrines and precepts.

Satan quoted Scripture to Christ, and Christ replied: "Again it is written." The little word "again" may offset the force of a misapplied quotation when accompanied with other Scripture. It is possible to dwell upon the theme that "Love covers a multitude of sins," to the obscurity of the truth expressed in the language that "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee." Some might feel licensed to do that which would bring condemnation, under the cloak that "when in Rome they may do as Rome does," forgetting that elsewhere "it is written," to him who knows and does not, "to him it is sin."

It is essential that Scripture be correctly applied and interpreted. Otherwise it will retard rather than advance the great cause. The light turned upon the whole gospel, or the light of the gospel will reveal things as they are, while the imaginations may suggest from a mere human standpoint and may not be in accord with truth.

The International Lesson.

FOURTH QUARTER.

LESSON I.

TENTH MONTH 2, 1904.

ELISHA SUCCEEDS ELIJAH.

2 Kings 2: 12-22.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me.—
2 Kings 2: 9.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Ninth mo. 26.—Elisha succeeds Elijah. 2 Kings 2: 12-22.
Third-day, Ninth mo. 27.—Elijah's ascension. 2 Kings 2: 1-11.
Fourth-day, Ninth mo. 28.—God's mighty power. Psa. 104: 1-8.
Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 29.—The spirit promised. Joel 3: 28-32.
Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 30.—The spirit received. Acts 2: 1-18.
Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 1.—The waters divided. Josh. 3: 10-17.
First-day, Tenth mo. 2.—Waters "made sweet." Exod. 15: 23-26.

Time.—About 850 B.C., but the exact time is uncertain. Elisha's service as a prophet was during the reigns of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz and Jehoash, kings of Israel; that is, about fifty years, from 850 to 798 B.C.

Place.—Elisha's first work was at Jericho, then at Samaria, and for at time at Dothan (12 miles north-east of Samaria), and at Shunem (near Jezreel).

Rulers.—At the time of the lesson, Jehoram, son of Ahab, king of Israel; Jehoram or Joram, ruling with his father Jehoshaphat, over Judah.

Elisha was the son of Shaphat; his home had been at Abel-Meholah (1 Kings 19: 16), a few miles south of the Sea of Galilee. He was evidently the son of well-off parents, for when Elijah called him he was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen. He was for ten years the close companion of Elijah, and doubtless was deeply imbued with his spirit. He was, except in his devotion to the service of Jehovah, a great contrast to Elijah, for he was fond of civilized home life, and on almost all occasions was quiet, gentle and compassionate.

The lesson follows closely on the last.

12. "And Elisha saw it." The ascension of Elijah. (See verse 10.) "The chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." Meaning that the prophet was a greater strength to Israel than all its chariots and horsemen. "Rent them." A very common way in the East of expressing sorrow. (Compare Matt. 26: 65; Gen. 37: 34.)

13. "The mantle of Elijah." The mark of his prophetic office. It was probably of camel's hair or skin. (See 1 Kings 19: 19.)

14. "And said, Where is the Lord, the God of Elijah?" This is not to be understood as an expression of doubt or even as a test; it was as if he said, I have seen the departure of Elijah, I know that I have received a double portion of his spirit, now let these standing near have a proof that it is so.

15. "Which were at Jericho." (R.V.) Equivalent to, which belonged at Jericho. They had come to the Jordan to see. The translation of the Authorized Version cannot be right, as it would be manifestly impossible to see from Jericho Elisha cross the Jordan. The sons of the prophets were convinced that Elisha was indeed the chosen successor of Elijah, and they gave him like reverence.

16. There seems to have been a belief, caused doubtless by the mysterious appearances and disappearances of Elijah, that he was transported hither and thither by "the spirit of the Lord." These sons of the prophets therefore wished that a thorough search should be made for Elijah. They seem to have doubted Elisha's account of the translation of Elijah. "Ye shall not send." To have allowed them to send without at least protest would have been to cast discredit on his prophetic office.

17. "Till he was ashamed." He was at a loss how to refuse them any longer, though he knew the search would be a useless one.

18. Elisha went to Jericho to wait for the return of the seekers. "Did I not say." The whole account is very true to human nature.

19. It was very important that Elisha should be held and esteemed by his countryman as a prophet, and the best way in that age to confirm this opinion was by means of miracles. The utterance of spiritual truths alone would have had little effect. "The situation is pleasant." Jericho was pleasantly situated in a verdant plain, though not a healthy one. It was called the "City of Palm Trees." "Naught." Bad, an old English use of the word which survives in our "naughty." (Compare Jer. 24: 2.) "And the land mis-carrieth." The marginal reading of the Revised Version is "casteth her fruit." The meaning seems to be that the effect of the water was to cause the trees to shed their fruit prematurely; the cattle also were affected by the water, and possibly human beings.

20. "Bring me a new cruse." It was necessary that it should be new to show that a cruse had no special virtue, and had not been used before. It was, also, brought to Elisha, it was used before. It was, also, brought to Elisha, it was not one which he had in his possession. This also was to show the miraculous nature of what he was about to do. The Hebrew word for cruse is not the same one as that used when speaking of the widow's cruse of oil (1 Kings 17: 12); there it was rather a jar or a bottle; here it means rather a bowl or dish. "Salt." Always an emblem of purity and preservation; here it was probably symbolical.

21. "Cast salt therein." Why did not Elisha simply speak the word and make the waters pure? It is impossible to say, except that the age was an age of symbols, and that the people would be more impressed if a symbol was used—they expected a symbol or material instrument. We see this also in some of the miracles of our Lord. (Compare John 9: 6, 7; Mark 7: 33; 8: 23, etc.) "Spring of the waters." The source.

22. "Unto this day." The time when the book of Kings was compiled.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Good men are the strength of a nation far more than armies or navies.
2. It is often needful to yield to the weakness of others in non-essentials.
3. The only sure way to destroy an evil is to destroy the source.

Christian Endeavor

[Communications for this department should be addressed to Lindley D. Clark, 1429 New York Avenue, Washington, D.C.]

TOPIC FOR TENTH MONTH SECOND.

HOW WE ARE IN TRAINING TO SUCCEED OTHERS.

Deut. 34: 7-12; Josh. 1: 1, 2.

Second-day, Ninth mo. 26.—The school of the prophets. 2 Kings 2: 5-7.
Third-day, Ninth mo. 27.—Samuel in training. 1 Sam. 3: 1-21.
Fourth-day, Ninth mo. 28.—David in training. 1 Sam. 16: 11-13.
Fifth-day, Ninth mo. 29.—One part of training. Prov. 4: 1-7.
Sixth-day, Ninth mo. 30.—Timothy training. Acts 16: 1-3; 17: 14, 15.
Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 1.—John Mark in training. Acts 13: 5; 2 Tim. 4: 11.

That men should die and that with them the experience and wisdom which come alone with years should be lost is, in one aspect, the great waste of the world. The artist dies and his marvelous skill of brain and hand has perished. The head of a firm is called aside and his large knowledge of facts and intricate details exists in no survivor. The leader in a meeting is summoned to the "rest that remaineth," and it seems almost as if the wheels of our chariots were locked.

But look again, and fancy what would occur if always the same hand, the same ideas, the same methods must control, while the later-born are to be held in check by the ancients. Christ chose twelve disciples—learners—"that they might be with Him," and of them He foretold that they should do greater works than His. He even looked beyond them, and prayed for their successors—those who should believe through their word.

Continuance with freshness, conservatism with progress, the passing on of the great impulse to be wrought into new lives and find new modes of expression—this is God's method of securing the accomplishment of His work in the world, and it belongs to the Church to use most carefully its opportunities to hold fast the good, while opening the way for all right advance.

Moses chose Joshua, and Elijah, Elisha. Samuel ministered to Eli, and Paul had those who gladly spent their days in his fellowship; these each in his time and way carried forward that work that passed to trained hands when the teacher labored no more on earth. One of the sad mistakes is when the "pillars of the church," grown old in faithful service, yet not knowing how to entrust some educative and developing part of it to their own children, dominate committee and church council to the exclusion of their adult sons and daughters, and go to the grave, leaving the church almost as lifeless as their own wasted bodies.

Christian Endeavor has meant work for the church by its younger members, and once in the harness it is much easier to take up the spiritual concerns and the business affairs of the main organization. Perhaps if the Church had always been wise there would have been no need of a separate branch of its work. As matters stand to-day the young people who have labored zealously and effectively as Endeavorers, leaving the Society in due time to active control by the on-coming "Juniors," are the well-trained successors of those who have bravely borne the heat and burden of the day, but have wisely opened one door here and another there that the younger members might unite with them in church undertakings while they were themselves yet in the power and vigor of an achieving manhood and womanhood.

Missionary Department.

[Communications for this department should be addressed to Herman Newman, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.]

Ramallah, Jerusalem, Palestine,

Eighth month 17th, 1904.

There are three ways for a missionary in the foreign field to look at his work which may be embodied in the expressions "Help them," "Help them to help themselves" and "Help them to help others." All mission work must of course begin with the first, if it is healthful it will proceed to the second, and if it is apostolic it must eventually reach the third. The question, therefore, arises, "How soon should the native church begin to reach out?" The church at Antioch was sending out laborers to foreign fields three years after it was founded, and took collections for the distant poor in four years' time. This was also characteristic of the churches at Philippi, Thessalonica and Corinth.

With these thoughts in mind we have been impressed since coming to this field that inasmuch as the work here has been well established for fully twenty years, it was high time for the people to begin to do some foreign missionary work. As it was our custom in the home-land to call special attention to the foreign work one Sabbath in August, and to take up a collection therefor, we saw no reason why we should not do the same here.

A congregation of about forty gathered on the morning of Eighth month 14th in the meeting house at Ramallah, and we were favored with the presence of Consul Merrill and his wife from Jerusalem. The parable of the talents was read from Matthew's gospel, and a short discourse was preached, through an interpreter, from the text, "There is that which scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is that which withholdeth more than is meet and it tendeth only to poverty." As the people here are much given to complaining of the poverty of the land, stress was laid upon the causes of spiritual poverty, especially the withholding of the part of our substance that belongs to the Lord.

At the close of the sermon the people were told a little of the excellent work that is being done in the heart of Africa by the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission. All who desired to give a penny a week during the coming year for the support of that work were asked to give their names at the close of the meeting. There were nineteen who signified their desire to do this, which in the course of the year will amount to over ten dollars. We wondered if there were any Friends' meetings in America which do not raise that much in the course of the year for foreign missions? The following day the teacher of our day school at Ophra brought me two dollars which she wished to give.

Thus while the white hand of America is reaching out to help the dark hand of the Syrian, it in turn is seeking to give some help to the black hand of Africa.

The readiness with which the people responded was one of the most encouraging things that we have seen in connection with our work here, and we are sure that as we do our little to help the more needy we shall ourselves be refreshed.

A. EDWARD KELSEY.

EXTRACTS FROM QUARTERLY REPORT OF THE FRIENDS' AFRICA INDUSTRIAL MISSION.

Kaimosi, via Kisumu, British East Africa,

Sixth month 1st, 1904.

To the Executive Committee of the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission, Emma B. Malone, Secretary, 702 East Prospect St., Cleveland, Ohio, U. S. A.

Dear Friends: Since our last quarterly report we have experienced the most serious interruption that has ever been permitted to break in upon the work here.

While the Government was having some trouble with the Nandi Tribe, about the middle of Fourth month, it sent a small body of native soldiers to guard our station. For several days previous to Fourth month 28th we had heard considerable shooting, and from the top of the hill on our east boundary could see the smoke of burning huts as the Government's punitive expedition advanced. On this day (Fourth month 28th) the guard from our station went out into the forest, and had a skirmish with some of the Wanandi. William Wendte, the young man from Massachusetts who was stopping here, also went out, but without our knowledge and not in company with the soldiers. Several Wanandi were killed in the encounter, and the guard returned. One soldier, however, who was separated from the others did not return, and William Wendte was also nowhere to be seen. Careful search was made, but it was not until the following day that the bodies of William Wendte and the native soldier were found. They had been killed about fifty yards from one another, and their bodies were riddled with scores of arrow and spear wounds. The occurrence caused great anxiety to the Government officials as to the safety of the mission, and they at once hastened troops to the station. For a full month our place was more like a military camp than a quiet mission station. We continued our work as best we could, but our employees were naturally more or less distracted and unsettled. With a station full of soldiers and a host of porters, it was impossible to get much work done. The interruption was not confined to the industrial branch alone, but seemed to dissipate all serious thinking among our employees along religious lines. Altogether it seemed an extremely sad and unfortunate issue, and one calculated to cause the Wanandi to feel even more suspicious of us than before. However, it was all permitted to come, and we believe the Lord will overrule all to His own glory and praise. The event has led the Government to establish a temporary military outpost in Nandi only a few miles east of here.

Work has been carried on continuously at the dam which is nearing completion. A sluice-way is being cut, and we look forward with no little satisfaction, and perhaps some pride, to the time when the saw-mill will be installed and in working order.

Owing to the moving of our brickyard and preparations for a greater output, we have burned no bricks during the past quarter, but have just begun operations again, and hope now to make more rapid progress in this department. We feel that one of the most important things on hand is to build permanent and fireproof buildings as fast as possible.

The thatched roof for church and school purposes is finished, but there is still work to be done, making a suitable floor and rostrum, and providing some kind of seats.

The mission office was moved about two months ago from a 7x9 tent to a 12x18 thatched building. On the night of Sixth month 13th the building was entered by thieves and the mission funds, with private cash taken. All was kept in a heavy iron trunk. This was carried into the bush, where the lock was smashed by heavy blows. The mission's loss amounted to $117.86. We have made every effort to obtain some trace of the thieves, but without success.

We have been so busy with various other things that our shamba has been neglected, and consequently our tables are very scarce of fresh vegetables. We have recently secured and planted a small amount of sugar cane and Uganda coffee as experiments.

Two men with a team of oxen and small cart are busy hauling dirt, gravel and stones for grading and walk-making about the new thatched dwelling-house premises.

During the past quarter five additional bullocks have been purchased at an average cost of $4.55 each. Several have died in the past few months and others are not doing well. We need and hope soon to provide a better boma for them to stay in at night.

We have reported to the Government that we are ready to do our part toward making a cart road to the outpost on the Kisumu road, but the officials say they cannot do their part yet. They had expected to use hut-tax labor in cutting the bush for us. We will commence our part when they prepare the way, but do not want to use our appropriation for bush cutting and then be unable to finish the other part.

We note with thankfulness the addition of $10.00 per month which you have been able to add to our allowance for the work; also that we are to have a team of mules and harness. These will be especially valuable when our farming implements arrive. We are sending with this a list of needed tools, implements, etc. Dr. Blackburn has made a one-man power-turning lathe which adds very materially to our station equipment.

Our employees have settled down again, and interest in our daily Gospel services is much better than one month ago. A representative continues to spend the Sabbath with Kivini's people, ten miles north of here, every two weeks, and some other itinerating is done from time to time. About two months ago smallpox broke out in the district near Kivini's, and has spread to such an extent that we fear our work may have to be discontinued there for a time.

Fifth month 13th brought a little daughter to the home of Doctor and Virginia L. Blackburn, and we are thankful to report that all are well. Little Doris Esther may some day appreciate the distinction of being the first white child born in this part of East Africa.

Our old English friend, W. Barnes, returned nearly a month ago after a siege of illness, near Nairobi, where he had been working. He is greatly improved in health, although obliged to live in a tent for want of house room.

We very much appreciate the arrival on Sixth month 11th, of Emory J. Rees and wife, and thank God for His good hand upon the work in sending such acceptable helpers to us. The former is getting the school work started after a forced vacation of several weeks on account of the absence of pupils during the recent unsettled condition.

Dr. Blackburn's quarterly report of the medical department is attached hereto.

With hearts full of praise to our Heavenly Father for His great goodness to you in the home-land and to us here, we enter gladly and with encouraged hearts upon a new quarter's work. We know not what is before us, but are confident in the assurance of our Master that, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Yours, in the love of Christ,

EDGAR T. HOLE,

On behalf of the mission.

QUARTERLY REPORT OF THE MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

It has occurred to me that it might be of interest to the Board for me to make up a medical report, not only for the quarter just ended, but also for the past twelve months, this being the end of my first year's work among these people.

First, I shall give a tabulated list of the operations performed during the year:

	Cases.	Died.
Laparotomy for perforated arrow wound of abdomen	1	1
Amputation of toe	1
Removal of necrosed bone from finger .	2
Extensive necrosis of tibia from long-standing ulcer, necrosed bone removed	1
Incision and drainage from inguinal bubo	1
Incision and drainage from deep spear wound of abdomen	1
Incision and drainage from spear wound through fore-arm	1
Incision and drainage from arrow wound in gluteal region	1
Abscess, mammary region, incision and drainage	1
Incision and drainage for poisoned arrow wound in pectoralis major	1

In this list of eleven operations, such so-called operations as the opening of small abscesses and surgical measures of similar slight importance have been eliminated.

In scanning the list it can readily be seen that of the eleven operations recorded two may justly be ranked as capital. A laparotomy for perforating arrow wound of the abdomen was the first and the one that resulted fatally. This case was brought to us late in the evening after lying in the hot sun or in a native hut since morning. From the very nature of the case it seemed that the patient was doomed from the start, as the arrow had penetrated quite deeply into the abdomen; and as was proven afterward, carried the infection with it. The case was subjected to operation simply as giving the unfortunate patient a last chance.

The other, a spear wound of the abdomen, so far as we are able to learn, made a prompt recovery. As we have no proper hospital facilities, and often cannot keep our patients here, it is sometimes difficult to learn the exact condition of those who live some distance away.

The poisoned arrow case was one of the soldiers wounded on Fourth month 28th, in the encounter with the Wanandi. He made a prompt recovery.

In looking over the figures for the year, I find 2,211 cases have been treated. Many of these have been ailments of minor importance, a goodly per cent. of the surgical cases have been dressings, and ulcers of the leg and hand have been greatly in the majority.

Numbers of the medical cases have been gastric disturbances, due in many instances to over-eating and to improperly prepared food.

Cases treated from Fourth month 1st to Seventh month 1st, 1904:

	Medi- cal	Surgi- cal	Vene- real	Der- mal	Den- tal	Obstet- ric	Opera- tions
Men . . .	133	142	20	5	12		2
Women .	7	10	11	5		1
Children	41	17		3

Total, 409 cases.

You will note two new classes added to the list this quarter—dental and obstetrical. The latter is the first of this class of cases which we have been called to attend among these people, and we take it as a further proof of their growing confidence in us; but even yet they are not ready to throw over their traditions and superstitious customs, and allow us to do all that should be done; but our faith looks forward to a time when by the aid of the Holy Spirit they will abandon their heathendom, and walk in the light, clothed, and in their right minds.

Between the dates of Sixth month 21st and 27th, I attended the wife of Dr. Mayes, the Collector at the Nandi Government Post, at the time of the arrival of their second child. I might mention here that on our return trip from Nandi, we came through the supposedly hostile district, and were not in any way disturbed. On the contrary, the people seemed quite friendly, and showed us not a little kindness when they learned we were from the mission. This may have been due partially to the fact that we had fifteen soldiers with us, and natives have a great respect for the soldier when he bears a gun. Our men did not know the nearest route through this country to the mission, and we appealed to the Wanandi to show us the path; one man immediately left his garden work, throwing aside his spear and armed only with a small stick, he marched at the head of our line, and guided us safely after a few hours' march to the mission. For this service and to show him we are friendly, we gave him a bright red blanket and a packet of salt.

We are thankful for these varied opportunities for ministering to the needs of these people, for we see in it some of the Lord's "least ones." May He Himself hasten the day when they, too, shall acknowledge Him Lord of all.

Faithfully yours in the service of the King,

E. BLACKBURN, M.D.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

A. W. Mendenhall has moved from his old home in Iowa to Hubbard, Oregon.

The missionary offerings of Indianapolis Meeting this year were about $300.

Joseph and Mary Goddard have returned from Bay View, Mich., where they enjoyed a short rest.

I. Emory Pearson visited Iowa Yearly Meeting, and expects to attend Western and other yearly meetings.

Levi Mills and S. Adelbert Wood preached a number of doctrinal sermons at Iowa Yearly Meeting, which were much enjoyed.

E. Howard Brown is to take the pastoral work in the Bear Creek Meeting, Iowa. He has just finished a successful year's work at New Sharon.

Morton C. Pearson has moved into the new parsonage recently built for the pastor of the Indianapolis Meeting. The parsonage address will be 313 East Thirteenth Street.

Wm. L. Pearson attended Glens Falls Quarterly Meeting very acceptably. Large evening meetings are now held at The Oneida in an unusual meeting house.

The plan of making a summary of the epistles from the several American yearly meetings, and reading them as a continuous statement of the progress of the Friends' Church for the year, was followed in Iowa Yearly Meeting this year.

The Friends of Salem, Iowa, will celebrate the sixty-sixth anniversary of the establishment of the meeting at that place, Tenth month 8th, 1904. Salem Meeting is the oldest Friends' meeting in Iowa.

George A. Barton delivered an illustrated lecture on "Jerusalem, Ancient and Modern," in the Friends' Meeting House in New Bedford, Mass., Ninth month 10th, and acceptably attended meeting there on the 11th inst.

The Christian Endeavor Social Committee in Poughkeepsie Meeting secured a list of house-keeping necessities which Willard O. Trueblood and his wife were intending to purchase for their new home. The articles came in upon them as a great surprise.

Charles E. Hiatt has just closed his second year's work as pastor in the meeting at Muncie, Ind., and has received and accepted a call to remain another year. His work has been very acceptable to his little flock in Muncie, and has been blessed of God.

Professors Rosa E. Lewis and Ethel Rosenberger take up their work at Penn College with a new vigor after their absence abroad. Prof. Lewis spent the greater part of the year in Europe, while Prof. Rosenberger was there only a few weeks, taking special language work.

A cordial invitation is extended to any Friends who may be visiting in Atlantic City to attend the monthly meeting of the Atlantic City Branch of the F. F. M. A., to be held at the residence of the president, 158 North Carolina Avenue, South, on Fourth-day, the 28th inst., at 8 p.m.

Samuel H. Hodges and wife, of South Glens Falls, N. Y., are likely soon to be recorded ministers in Glens Falls Quarter, N. Y. At present they are working efficiently in four meetings. Samuel Hodges has been assisting W. S. Aldrich in evangelistic meetings at South Starksboro, Vt.

Spiceland Quarterly Meeting, Ind., was held Ninth month 11th, with nearly all the monthly meeting delegates present. Joseph Williamson, of Cleveland, Ohio; Ida Parker, of Centreville, Ind., and William Thornbury, of Amboy, Ind., were the visiting ministers. Helpful messages were given.

Ninth month 5th Adna F. Heaton gave his annual clam-bake at his residence, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. It has become quite a social event for the Friends. Many ministers were present. There were 119 plates, 2,500 clams, and the full line of accessories. Willard O. Trueblood, who is engaged in pastoral work in Poughkeepsie, was one of the guests.

Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting, New York, was held Ninth month 8th, with a good attendance. J. Lindley Spicer, Willard O. Trueblood, Emily E. Peckham and others were engaged in Gospel service, which was acceptable to the meeting. The divine blessing was invoked that the truth held by our predecessor might be still maintained. The State of Society was brought before the meeting, and presented some encouraging features. Henry H. and Mary G. Swift were appointed delegates to attend the coming Peace Congress to be held in Boston.

Whittier College, Whittier, Cal., opened on Ninth month 13th. Quite a large addition is being made to the building. It will be completed about the middle of the school year, and will have not only additional class rooms, but also dormitories and complete arrangements for club boarding. We have three additions to the faculty this year—Prof. Rayner W. Kelsey, of Earlham College, in charge of the oratorical work; Ellen C. Keats, of Mt. Holyoke, Mass., professor of Latin, and Prof. O. C. Albertson, of Penn College, in charge of the department of science.

The meeting house at Cleo, Oklahoma, has been erected, and is now nearly completed, but means, too, are nearly exhausted. We are very thankful that Friends of Iowa, Indiana and Kansas have so freely contributed to this cause. Our members are very few, and most of the Friends living here are in limited circumstances. One man has done most of the work. All the work has been donated. The inside will soon be finished, so that it could be used, but we have not means enough yet to seat it. It will take about 125 chairs to seat the house at a cost of nearly 50 cents a chair. Then it will take nearly $25 yet to complete the house on the outside; that is, to paint it. If any of the Friends anywhere feel so disposed to give us of their means for this, the cause of Christ, it will be very gratefully and thankfully received. Address Ora L. Kellam, Cleo, Oklahoma.

Marion Quarterly Meeting, Ind., was held Ninth month 9th, 10th and 11th. Lida Lisle, of Iowa; Daniel A. Williams, of Wichita, Kansas; John W. Vinnege, of Cherry Grove, Ind., and F. H. Tormohlen, of Upland, Ind., with a few others from neighboring quarters, were in attendance. F. H. Tormohlen was present soliciting aid for the completion of a meeting house at Upland. Lida Lisle has been attending Taylor University at Upland, and for several months past in connection with her school work she has been working as pastor in a small meeting in the northeastern part of Grant County, where she has done a noble work in the saving of many souls. The Gospel ministry of all of the visiting ministers was appreciated. Two new monthly meetings set off from Marion Monthly Meeting were granted at this time. One of them at the point where Lida Lisle has been laboring, to be known as Milo Monthly Meeting, and to be held on Third-day before the second Seventh-day in each month, at 7 o'clock p.m.; and the other to be known as South Marion Monthly Meeting, and held on Fifth-day before the second Seventh-day, at 7.30 p.m., both to be opened at the time of holding in the Tenth month.

A Friend who was present has sent us an account of the reunion held at Timbered Hills, Kansas, Eighth month 21st, 1904:

"It was a very impressive and favored time. The house was filled, and while most of those present came into the neighborhood during the last few years, we who had attended meeting there thirty years ago could in imagination call up the forms of those who were wont to gather with us, many of whom have been 'promoted' to the church triumphant.

"The meeting was opened by prayer and song; a few words of welcome by Willis H. Wheeler followed. At the request of Lydia M. Chace the 90th Psalm was read, and she gave a few words of encouragement. The sermon by Frances Liter from the text, 'Moses my servant is dead' (Joshua 1: 2), reviewed the past, spoke of present conditions, and abounded with instruction for the future.

"Near the close of this meeting all who at any time had been members of Timbered Hills Meeting were asked to rise, and many gave words of testimony to the loving care of the Master.

"A bountiful dinner was served under the beautiful trees which surround the church, and all enjoyed the social hour.

"The afternoon meeting was devoted to reminiscences of the past, in which Isaac Haworth, Willis H. Wheeler, Jennie Kelsey Marsh, A. L. More, Melissa Ferguson Moore took part. A history of the monthly meeting from the time it was set up in 1873 to 1894 was read by Elma Wheeler, which gave many items of interest gleaned from its minutes. During that time three monthly meetings have been set off.

"Letters of greeting had been received from Theodore Wilson, Lizzie Willson, Aaron Bray and family, Nathan Snodgrass, Emma Lee, Bettie Parker, Thomas Smith, Myrtle J. Patton and Lucinda Willey, which were read.

"Among those present were Emily Dixon, who attended the first meeting held in the little log house; W. H. Wheeler and G. E. Horner, who are the only persons who were members of the preparative meeting when established that are members at this time."

"Many loving words were spoken of those who had joined the church triumphant. Ellwood Haworth and Ira Easterling, who had expected to be present, having been prevented by the death that morning of Asa Haworth, all heads were bowed as Frances Liter prayed for them and the bereaved wife, Alice Easterling Haworth, who was married in the church ten years ago."

He had been for years a trustee of Baltimore Monthly Meeting and a member of the Permanent Board of Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

nize that crying abuses are attached to it. It has been profaned, soiled, compromised more than any other expression of the human tongue. And yet—what a place it occupies and how it has filled the souls of men for centuries and centuries! It is the sweetest name I have heard since my youth. To have Sirius disappear from the firmament would cause me less regret; never more to see stars in the night would leave me in an obscurity less dark than to see disappear from my memory that name, blessed above all others! Renounce it? And why? Because the hypocrite uses it in his cheating, the fanatic in his anathema, the scholastic in his subtleties? Poor reason! God is more certain to me than the world and than life. I name sorrow, that I do not understand; and death, that is a mystery to me. Why should my lips be silent as to him who consoles me for the one and the other?

The great moral and religious value of the Bible in life; the necessity of church organization; the symbolic character of certain dogmas of expiation, for instance; the strange and abnormal fact beyond our limited wisdom to comprehend, that everywhere and at all times the good suffer for the bad—he expresses with the clear, definite simplicity of mind and language which, as in "The Simple Life," appeals to our own simplicity, to our own pastoral days of youth, and faith and all pure sentiments. "Prayer," he says, "is the thought of man, his whole soul opened like a book beneath the look of Him who alone knows how to see all and comprehend all. If man understood what a refuge prayer was, he would see in it his highest prerogative."

M. Wagner's name first crossed the ocean to the United States with his book, "Youth"; "Courage" and "Justice" were translated for us shortly after they appeared in Paris, during the nineties. The rest has followed as a matter of course. The desire to know more of the man; then to know him, his co-workers; and then comes the desire to have him know us; our work, our workers.

This is the aftermath of his harvest

INTER-STATE FAIR AT TRENTON.

September 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30.

The great Inter-State Fair will be held on September 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th and 30th, on the Fair Grounds, near Trenton, N. J., on the New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets to the Fair Grounds, including coupon of admission, at greatly reduced rates, from stations within a wide radius, and special trains over the New York, Belvidere and Amboy Divisions will be run through to the grounds, thus avoiding street-car transfer.

As in previous years, every department will be replete with superior and instructive displays. The blooded stock exhibit will be particularly fine, and the daily program of races contains the speediest classes obtainable. The management of the Fair has put forth extraordinary efforts to make this year's exhibition even greater than last year's record-breaking display.

MUTUAL NEED AND ASSURANCE.

The great, true socialism of the future, the great thing that is going to make us all work together as the generations pass by is the mutual need and the assurance that, for such vast work as has got to be done in this world before all shines perfectly with true lustre, God is going to require service of every man with every other man, and all true serving men are brethren. And the work that any of us do is so great, and the work that any of us do is so little, that we may well join hands in doing it, and never question which is the strongest, if we can only be one in the brotherhood of united souls.—Phillips Brooks.

"Here's a poem on the 'Owld Counthry,' sorr," said a frayed-looking individual to the editor of a weekly newspaper in a large town; "an' it's hopin' you'll take it, Oi am."

"What is your address?" inquired the editor.

"That dipinds intoirely on you, sorr," responded the poet with a cheerful smile.

"Depends on me!" echoed the editor;

"what do you mean?"

"If yez take the bit poem, sorr, me addthress will shtill be sivinty-wan Dixer Sthrate," replied the sanguine poet; "but if yez don't take it," he added, darkly, "it's meself that'll be lift widout anny addthress to me name, if me land-lady kapes her wurrd, sorr!"

A SILENT PILOT.

Nothing helps so much in the enjoyment of your vacation as a good map. It shows you the streams and lakes you can fish, the mountains you can climb, the places of interest you can visit and the roads you can wheel or tramp. The Lackawanna Railroad has just issued a set of colored maps on a large scale, showing the territory reached by its lines in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These maps give every highway, post office, trolley line and railroad, and are so bound that they can be conveniently carried in the pocket. They are invaluable to automobile tourists and travelers, and should be owned by every one who wishes to be informed on the geography of these three States. The entire set in a neat cover may be had by sending ten cents in stamps to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York city. The edition is limited. Write to-day.

A GOOD KIND OF RELIGION.

Your religion is good if it is vital and active ; if it nourishes in you confidence, hope, love, and a sentiment of the infinite value of existence ; if it is allied with what is best in you against what is worst, and holds forever before you the necessity of becoming a new man ; if it makes you understand that pain is a deliverer ; if it increases your respect for the conscience of others ; if it renders forgiveness more easy, fortune less arrogant, duty more dear, the beyond less visionary. If it does these things it is good, little matter its name : however rudimentary it may be, when it fills this office it comes from the true source, it binds you to man and to God.

IT WORKS.

THIS is one of Paul's great words—It WORKS. Any interested reader can, in a few minutes, look up the passages in which the apostle describes how his religion works. Here are some of his glowing expressions: "Grace worketh;" "Faith worketh;" "Love worketh;" "Hope worketh;" "the Holy Spirit worketh;" "a new creation" worketh, i. e., avails; "Tribulation worketh;" "this light affliction worketh;" "Godly sorrow worketh;" "All things work for those that love God"! What a religion of practical power that is! How it fits the time!

"Will it work?" is the first question which everybody in these busy days asks of everything which claims attention. Some man suggests tapping Niagara and using a little side stream to generate electrical power. Will it work? is the eager question. As soon as it is well proved that it does work, there is a rush of capital for investment in Niagara power. When the news came that it was possible to telegraph without wires, most persons doubted. It must be a wild imagination. But no, a single word is clicked across the ocean, and soon all the great steamers go out equipped with apparatus and keep up intercourse from shore to shore. It works. Everybody believes in it now.

Why is it so hard to raise money for constructing airships? Why do we take so little interest in the stories about them? They are deadly machines so far. They fail to work. Attempts to extract gold out of sea water, and to make diamonds out of charcoal have from time to time been made, but these undertakings do not work. There is gold in sea water, and charcoal and diamonds are both composed of carbon, but we lack a working process. Stock in "gold-from-sea-water" companies is absolutely worthless. Telephone stock is good, because the telephone works.

Sooner or later the world comes back from bogus religions to one which works. Human nature loves to experiment, and every new fashion, even in religions, gets tried, for its hour. But the deep heart of man in the time of stress and strain, when the reins are tested, wants a religion that works. A thousand forms of religion have died out of memory and are as weak to-day as the beams of Noah's ark. But the great life-currents of Christ's religion flow on for the healing both of men and of nations. It still works. It works wherever it is fairly tried. Darwin was amazed when he saw what Christianity was doing for the Tahiti savages. He wrote: "The lesson of the missionaries is the enchanter's wand; the march of improvement consequent on the introduction of Christianity in the South Seas probably stands by itself in the records of history." No; it does not stand alone. The similar record comes from all peoples where the same gospel is tried. It made over the bloody German warriors into Christian men, and it has the same power to-day, whether it is tried in Palestine, in New York slums or in the home of the city millionaire. Wherever it gets a chance it works. The truth is as new as to-day and as old as the Apostle James that a faith that does not work is dead. There is little hope for a religion of which it cannot be said, it worketh.

AN APOSTLE OF SIMPLICITY.

CHARLES WAGNER, the remarkable pastor of a remarkable flock in the city of Paris, says that he has had a "call" to come to America—a call to come to "a people fast losing the sense of simplicity," which, he rightly holds, is an essential quality of all spirituality.

Those who have read his beautiful little book on "The Simple Life," will not be surprised to learn that he has a great regard for Friends. It is, of course, the idea of simplicity and sincerity which attracts him to Quakerism. He knows little or nothing of our actual history—nothing at all of our isms and contentions; he has merely heard that we maintain and inculcate a simple, sincere life. "I have a special regard for the Quakers," he said, on landing in this country, "to the extent that they have their religion in the spirit rather than in outward show." Would he continue the same "special regard" if he made a careful investigation to see whether the Friends in these hurrying times are cultivating the simple life among themselves, and doing heroic work to make the simple life prevail in society?

How much easier it is to profess some "abstract" grace than it is to practice it in actual life! We all admire the noble sacrifice which early Friends made to cut free from slavery to fashion and worldliness.

We continue our "testimony" against worldliness and the dangers of luxury. But alas! we are doing very little to promote the genuine simple life, such as this new apostle of Quakerism in Paris is preaching and illustrating. Some of us suppose that the battle is won by "taking up the cross" in the form of a set garb. Others are too much occupied in settling theological distinctions to give much attention to the practical things of a life here and now. Still others really are eager for a society career, and the simple life is not the way to "success." So that as a result a man from the metropolis of fashion and luxury comes to do our work and to "take our crown." He has a "call" to preach simplicity to the people among whom we have lived two centuries and a half—"a people fast losing the sense of simplicity," spite of the fact that we have been living and preaching among them.

The task was, of course, too great for a somewhat feeble folk like us to accomplish, but the humiliating thing is that we have hardly done anything at it at all. We have cared for other things more—for things which did not belong to our mission. It may be well, too, for us to note what "simplicity" really means. This is what it means to this modern man with a "call": "Simplicity is simplicity of heart—a new ear for the promptings of the soul."

"The doctrine is only that a man be a man; when he is that, he may be of finance, of ease, of the sea, of the wars, of the state, of the farm, of the forest. A man is not necessarily simple because he goes barefoot, sits on a wooden chair, wears ragged clothes and eats bread and drinks water. He may do all those things and be as one filled with guile; or he may do none of them and yet walk in the proper path. I do not preach that the street-sweeper is necessarily simple in the spiritual sense. The boast of the highest ought to be that he is only a man; of the lowest, that he is a man."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

JACOB, OR HOW REFORMATION HALTS.

"He halted upon his thigh." Gen. 32: 31.

BY CHARLES M. WOODMAN.

The book of Genesis, because it is professedly the simple narration of the early history of the race, is capable of various interpretations. It permits of this method because of the personality which is so prominent in this outline which has come down to us through the ages. The personal element is so much in the foreground that the whole book may easily resolve itself into a series of portraits, each one of which gives to us in type a particular stage of development or decline through which the human race has passed.

An attempt to group these characters gives us two series of pictures, each series characterized by the absence or presence of a great principle of development. In chapters one to eleven, inclusive, with the central characters Adam, Eve, Cain, Abel and Noah, together with the story of the Tower of Babel, we have portrayed to us the sad deterioration of the human race, a deterioration that even the flood could not stem the current of. Its leading characteristic was negative, and may best be defined as the want of the spirit of altruism. The ego was the one thing to live for; self was supreme. Beginning with chapter twelve, and centering around the characters of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, there is plain evidence of a different spirit, a new impulse which thinks not only of self, but of others, the spirit of altruism, the forgetfulness of self, sacrifice for the sake of others.

The first part of the book of Genesis may be looked upon as the beginning, the unfolding and the end of sin. It shows humanity passing from a state of unconscious innocence, through sin to the natural result—destruction. It matters not what view may be held regarding these early records, the principle developing throughout is universally true to human experience; sin rooted fundamentally in selfishness always brings death. The first part of Genesis shows us the descent from innocence to death, with selfishness as the weight which drags man down; the second part of the book shows the ascent—the beginning, the development and the prevailing of reformation,—with the underlying principle of unselfishness acting as a counterweight to lift man up, not up the incline down which he has come from innocence, but up another better pathway to a still loftier peak—the knowledge of God. And let it be said that Genesis, though it starts us on the upward incline and goes with us over the initial steps of the journey, leaves us at its close with the mountain still unscaled, the consummation still unreachd—unreachd in reality, but reached in vision, for the light of the consummation of revelation shines upon the pathway from the beginning in those words which were given to Abraham. "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

This survey shows to us the road over which reformation is to travel. The character of Abraham gives to us the beginning and the cost of this long upward journey, illustrating the operation of the fundamental principle of unselfishness, and showing the cost in the sacrifice of all, even his best, for the end that is in view—the fullness of the knowledge of God. When we view this principle sweeping into the midst of humanity with so much power, the end seems close at hand, but just here there is thrown upon the screen of history the portrait of Jacob, and we see how, though the principle of unselfishness is vigorously active, the old principle of selfishness is not dead, but there goes on before us a terrible struggle between the old and the new, between selfishness and unselfishness, between egoism and altruism. Or, to put the same thought in other words, it is the struggle between man's higher and lower nature, the effort of the ideal to bring up the real to its standard, and the effort of the real to drag down the ideal. It is the old problem of the relation between the moral and the spiritual life. Man lives spiritually on one plane, and morally upon another, and because he does that reformation halts.

Let us study, then, for a moment this portrait of Jacob. We see first the boy. In that bargain with his brother the old principle of selfishness is vigorously at work, urging him to take advantage for his own sake of another's necessity. Then we see the aged and blind father pronouncing his blessing upon Jacob, supposing him to be Esau. Here Jacob becomes the deceiver, the supplanter, and selfishly takes advantage of another's weakness. All this necessitates a removal from home. He goes out alone to meet the world, to make his fortune. At night he lies down to sleep, the stones are his pillow. In his sleep there comes a dream, a vision; he sees the ladder set up between earth and heaven; he sees angels going up and down; he hears the voice of Jehovah. It is a religious experience—the dawning of the spiritual life—and the dawning of the spiritual life, then, as now, means the active operation in the moral life of the spirit of unselfishness. He passes from Bethel a new man, with the new principle operative in his life—the new principle operative, but not dominant as yet. The old is still there; it rules, but the struggle is on between the two, and eventually the principle that makes for the great end will rise supreme, and, though halting, reformation still advances. This new principle became very troublesome. It disputed with him constantly. It interrupted him in the market place. It checked him at the receipt of custom. It barred him at the buying of land. It cried out when he gave false measure. It said at the most inconvenient times, "Remember your brother! Remember your neighbor! Remember your fellow-man!" Thus the struggle went on, and for many long years, in spite of the vision of the ideal, in spite of his religious life, in spite of the power for good that was working within, the old spirit remained and showed itself to be supreme in all his dealings with his Uncle Laban. As the result of his selfishness drove him away from home in his early years, so now the same power compelled him to leave the place of his sojourn with Laban. He turns toward the home of his boyhood, but no sooner does he do so than the consequences of his early deceptive selfishness begin to face him. His life, ruled by selfishness, has been one long series of false steps, and he faces now the inevitable result of the working of that principle—destruction. But now, dissatisfied with the old, terrified at its results, he brings to the ascendancy in his life the new principle, the spiritual—he thinks of God. Alone and in the night we see him by the river side wrestling with the angel, wrestling with conscience, wrestling with God. Here the unselfishness, the spiritual rises to power. It locks arms with the selfishness and greed, and all through the night in the inner recesses of his being the struggle goes on. This time it is a fight to the death. Finally, as the first glimmer of morning light breaks on the eastern sky, the principle that was operative in the life of Abraham, the power of truth, of unselfishness, throttles the low, the vile, the mean, the deceptive, and tramples it beneath its feet. Jacob, the selfish, the supplanter, rises from that midnight struggle as Israel, the unselfishness, the Prince of God. But now note the significant fact: he rises from the struggle, conqueror, but he halts upon his thigh. Jacob, the supplanter, faced the world with a bold front, with his head carried high, with the air of one who possessed all he saw. Israel, the Prince of God, limps along the pathway of life with head bowed in humility.

The principle of selfishness is no longer present as a dominating power in his life, but it has left its impress on his character, and he must carry it to his dying day. Hence he halts as he journeys along the pathway of life. Arrogance has gone, selfishness has disappeared, pride is humbled, and the story of the life of Jacob from this point on is one continually sad portrayal of a soul disappointed and suffering because of its early sin. A law has been transgressed. The halting upon his thigh as he crossed the ford Jabbok is but a figure illustrating the inner pain that permeated his life during the later years. We cannot but pity him as we pity one who suffers to-day, but we know in his case, as we know in thousands of cases that come under our observation, that his suffering is but the natural result of early years spent in dissipation, spent in sin, spent with the principle of selfishness dominant in the life. The story of Jacob doting upon his favorite son Joseph has its pathetic side, but when we see the aged father mourning the loss of his son, whom he believes has been destroyed by wild beasts, we awake to the fact that in this deception Jacob is but reaping the reward of his own early life. He, too, deceived his father, and now in his own children he is reaping the reward of his own sin. How like a flash of lightning this illumines for us those fundamental and unchanging laws that seem severe in their stating, while yet they are laws which are the preserving powers of the society in the midst of which we live. "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments." Jacob indeed suffered the consequences of his early sin, and that sin left its mark upon his race; but just as surely Jacob and his race were the recipients of that mercy which was so radiantly revealed in the consummation of the love of God, the coming of the Christ. Or, again, there is that other law stated in the New Testament, a law which is fundamental to all human experience. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap, for he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." Here again Jacob is but the illustration which reveals the force of the law; that which he sowed in selfishness and sin he reaped in suffering, in misery, in death; that which he sowed in unselfishness he reaped in the consciousness of God's approval, and in the undying influence of truth and righteousness, in life everlasting. Thus do we see Jacob advancing as the spiritual principle takes root in his life; and at the same time do we behold the advance hindered as we witness the operation of the other law in his life, the law of sin and selfishness. This is how reformation halts.

Before we turn to consider the operation of this law in history and human experience study that incident where Jacob wrestles with the angel to discover the origin of the law that necessitates halting when the sin is present. The wrestling with the angel was long and severe; the outcome was seemingly in doubt, but the time came when the true power of the angel, God's representative, was revealed in that final act when "he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint." The angel causes Jacob to halt. Strip this of its figure, look into the experience of Jacob, and into the experience of humanity, and it will be seen that the law which causes reformation to halt operates because of sin, but it is nevertheless the law of God. Someone has beautifully said, "The laws of nature are the thoughts of God, and he who understands these laws thinks God's thoughts after Him." If you bruise a plant it will not grow with the vigor and life that it possessed before; it halts in its growth. Let the nobler nature of man become bruised by the continual operation of the selfish principle, and it becomes unfitted to advance with vigor and power; it halts in its progress and development.

To ask for the reason for this is to ask virtually for the reason for things as they are. The answer can be found alone in the nature of God Himself, and in the fact that this nature is the great end toward which it is the purpose of God that the whole race of mankind should move. That which is unlike God, therefore, must ever block the wheels of progress as the race struggles on toward that "One far-off divine event,

To which the whole creation moves."

We said near the beginning of our discussion that the book of Genesis in its latter portion carried us through the initial steps of reformation, but left us very far short of the end that is in view, save as it is given in vision. If the end of reformation is the knowledge of God in all its fullness, and if the progress of that reformation is hindered because of the elements that are visible here in the portrait of Jacob, it is interesting to see how the nation of which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were the professed founders moved toward this consummation. To read the record of their advance is to be impressed with the fact that the two elements that were working so powerfully in the life of Jacob are the same elements that have helped and hindered the nation as it moved on toward that condition out of which one could come who would represent to them and to us the ideal among men. Through all the years of their history from the beginnings of the nation as an outgrowth of the tribe in Egypt, through the long years of the wilderness experience, during the time of the Judges, under the Kings, in exile, and back again in the land of their nativity, the pendulum has been swinging backward and forward from the extreme of selfishness and sin, with its resulting destruction and misery, to the spiritual conception of a people who have placed God at their head, and are attempting as best they can to bear witness to Him.

What was true of Jacob, and was true of Israel as a nation, is equally true of society as a whole and of the individual. The movement toward the good is always hindered by a clinging to the bad. No forward movement was ever initiated for the uplifting of humanity that there was not a counter-current which tends to drag down. I turn to history for an example of the working out of this idea, and I see it in the Protestant Reformation. Under the impulse of the new spirit that was surging in the hearts of the people who had been touched by the spirit of the Renaissance, religious liberty was a thing for which they longed, and the thing that they would eventually have. The Reformation brought them out of bondage into freedom; the new principle was at work within, and set them free, but the old principle of bondage and authority was still present, and present in such a way that in England, at least—and the same may be said of the Reformation in Europe in some respects—though free in name, in reality they were bound under ecclesiastical laws that were just as severe as any under which they had previously been enslaved. Puritanism in England, though free in name, became in reality a papacy without a pope. Its authority was regnant, its power supreme. Hence reformation halted; hence the Reformation halted because the old spirit was present, and for a long time, and in some instances even until now, has held sway. There were a few who carried the Reformation to its logical outcome. These sects, so long as they persisted in this position, drew the people to them in throngs; but so soon as they drifted away from the true spirit that gave them birth to the sway of the old and the lower, they too ceased to attract and to win.

We have but to turn to the history of our own Society to see how pitifully true is this statement. Quakerism in its early stages was endued with the spirit of unselfishness. It sought in every way and at all times to give itself to the world. There were few places in England in those early days where people gathered together that the Quaker was not found at some time preaching the gospel as he interpreted it. He was always giving himself, and seeking to share with others the truth revealed to him. The time came in the process of the years when he ceased to think of others, and devoted his attention to the cultivation of his own spiritual life; to reach out for others became for him a positive wrong. That moment the old spirit that hindered progress in the past ages crept into the midst of Quakerism, and for one hundred and fifty years Quakerism numerically and spiritually was on the decline. It was inevitable, for the Quaker was in the grip of the old law that seeks to drag down, and not until within the past half century has he awakened to the fact that a wrong principle was at work in his midst. There are many places yet where the Quaker would do well to give this serious thought. If we are seeking as the great purpose of our life to give our gospel to others, we are in the line of progress; if not, we are still cultivating the garden of our own so-called spirituality, we are in the direct line of retreat, going with the downward current, which will eventually mean our disappearance from the stage of history. God's movement is always forward. He has no use for those who turn backward.

Turn finally to the individual life. Selfishness and unselfishness, the lower and the higher are constantly at war. Where the former is dominant there can be no progress; where the latter is the ruling power there is an onward and upward movement. Could we be free from the spirit of selfishness and all the tendencies and the results that come from its working, we would at once soar aloft and grasp our ideal; but so long as man is man, so long as the selfish instinct is in us, so long as its results are felt in our lives, though the principle as a power be done away with, so long will the ideal still unreached float in the sky above us, so long will reformation halt.

HOW A WELSH BOY BECAME A FRIEND.

[The following letter from Joseph Harrison to Frederick J. Gibbins gives an interesting personal account of the conversion of the former to Quakerism. The letter is reprinted from the "London Friend."—Ed.]

To Frederick Gibbins.

Friend:—At our Four Months' Meeting, held at Curwensville on the 14th inst., Dr. Richard Thomas and Anna, his wife, were present; and being in the company narrating to them how I became a Friend, it came to my mind that it may be profitable to make it known also to thee, as a proof of the vitality of Quakerism, though the work of writing a letter to a person across the ocean seems strange to me, not having written to my native country since the death of my parents over twenty years ago.

My father, William Harrison, worked at Pen-y-daren iron works, Merthyr Tydfil, as a refiner of iron. By some means he left and found employment at Neath Abbey iron works.* I was then a boy attending school at Cae Pant Tywell; and having heard of Neath, with its shipping, I made up my mind one morning, instead of going to school, to take the other road for Neath, determined to find my father, and see Neath and its wonders. My poor mother not knowing the plans of her only child, put up my dinner in the small basket, and away I went. I reached Neath Abbey † about nightfall, and inquired for my father. The old lodge-keeper very kindly gave me to the care of a Mr. Bonville. He took me to father, who happened to be on the night turn that week. After a little scolding, father took me to his lodging.

In a few days I heard much talk among the people about the Quakers, and wondered what kind of people they could be, inquiring of my father, who promised when leisure would allow, he would tell me all he knew about them. Leisure came, he told me about their mode of worship, its silence and why; free Gospel ministry, justness, plainness, truthfulness, non-observance of ordinances, hat-homage, women preachers; and explained to me what he thought was a cardinal doctrine with Friends—the universality of grace, or the measure of divine light given to all to profit withal.

Oh, good Friend, looking back over the years intervening since that day and this hour in which I am writing, what a strange life mine has been. In a few years afterwards I bade farewell to parents, country and kindred, and came, a stranger youth to a foreign country, away from advice, care and restraints of a godly mother and affectionate father. But, thanks to my Heavenly Father, the teachings of my father on that strange day never lost their hold of me. However far I wandered, whatever company I was in—strong temptation on the right and left, formal professors or avowed infidels—it made no difference. The measure of Light was with me; turning inward to myself in tavern or grog-shop, the voice of the Spirit could be heard by me; Christ the Light that enlighteneth every man was rebuking, accusing, and striving, also showing the path, and saying, "This is the way." Never could I have peace, never be happy in the way of sin or company of sinners, ever different from my companions. Did my poor father but know what effect his conversation would have upon his only son, I think he would weep at the thought of his son being different from most people, for I have been most of my life away entirely from Friends. And he would, methinks, shout with joy and gladness at the thought that he, by the divine blessing was showing to me the workings of the implanted Word that has proved too strong for all the wiles of the evil one, and all the oppositions that have tried to hinder me in my journey from a wicked world to a home of rest among the ransomed. Always would I defend the truth he taught me. On one occasion willingly did I face danger, rather than compromise Peace principles.

A few years ago I was made known to Friends, who kindly took me into membership; and, although I am living quite a distance from meeting, I attend as way opens. Their company I value, and their kindness to me can never by me be returned. Now, Friend, I ask thee to read this letter in Friends' meeting at Neath * if way will open, as an encouragement to faithfulness to sow beside all waters, leaving the increase to the Husbandman. As a tribute I owe to Friends, if I were young, happy would I be to cross the waves and preach (the Lord willing) the Gospel

* Then owned by Joseph Tregelles Price and other Friends.

† A distance of twenty-three miles.

* This was done.

on the very spot at Neath Abbey where my father taught me the doctrines and practices of the Quakers. But I may not: rather may I be called home to my Father's house, to mansions prepared by our Elder Brother, for ever to be with Him and His faithful ones.

Sincerely thine,

JOSEPH HARRISON.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.

The Western Yearly Meeting-house is a modest brick structure standing on a low hill in the midst of spacious grounds. To the north and immediately about the building are large shade trees, while to the south and west some three or four acres are set apart for the accommodation of the hundreds of horses and vehicles which convey the large crowds to these annual gatherings. The grounds are very pretty, yet modest in appearance. The meeting-house affords accommodation for about seven hundred people in the main auditorium, while a lecture room seating about two hundred, and committee rooms, are provided. To accommodate overflow meetings tents and stands are placed on the grounds. This year two large tents, with a capacity for about five hundred each, were pitched near the meeting-house.

Western Yearly Meeting of Friends presents a sturdy, large-hearted type of people. The men have forsaken their "straight collars" and "plain speech," and but few of the quaint bonnets and dresses characteristic of the traditional Friends are seen among the women, yet all are modest in both dress and speech. They have abandoned the old peculiarities, but they have retained much of the original simplicity and true moderation which gave strength and dignity to the ancient Friends, and which are vital elements in the message of true Quakerism. They are open-minded and progressive, yet loyal to what they believe to be essential principles.

The meeting on ministry and oversight of the forty-seventh annual gathering convened at 2 p.m. the 15th inst. The spirit of devotion here manifest, and the general survey of the field obtained from the reports from the various quarterly meetings, gave flavor and strength to the entire yearly meeting. A number of visiting ministers and friends were present. Others came in later. The following is a complete list of those with credentials: Amos Sanders and Robert L. Simpkin, New York; Charles E. Hiatt, Leanah Hobson, Gurney H. Dicks, Fred. E. and Alice Smith and Isaiah Jay, Indiana; Samuel T. Purviance and Thomas C. Hodgkin, Ohio; Zenas L. Martin and Grace M. and Melbourn Elliott, Iowa; I. Emory Pearson and Herman Newman, Kansas; and Benjamin F. and Bertha Andrews, Mexico.

The various sessions were well attended throughout. A healthy, earnest, hopeful spirit pervaded the meetings for devotion. Business was dispatched with promptness, and the hearty response to nearly every proposition bespoke a live general interest in all the affairs of the Church.

The yearly meeting formally opened the 16th inst., with Lewis E. Stout as presiding clerk and Lydia T. Painter as recording clerk. Ella M. Barrett and Martha E. Newlin were appointed reading clerks, and J. Waldo Moody succeeded Murray S. Kenworthy as announcing clerk. The large auditorium was nearly filled. Several elderly members, who were in attendance when the yearly meeting was organized, nearly fifty years ago, were present. A few of them had attended Indiana Yearly Meeting at Richmond, before Western was organized, and some were members of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, years ago, when Indiana Yearly Meeting was in its infancy.

The spirit of the whole meeting was well voiced by William Pyle in his remarks concerning the caretakers. "In former days," he said, "it was their business to see that outsiders did not get into the meeting, and if they did it was their duty to take them out again. To-day the caretaker has become an usher, and the stranger is now welcomed and given a place in the meeting. I am truly glad to see the change."

The department of social purity was the first to claim the attention of the meeting. A live interest and some good work was reported from some quarters, while others did not send in reports at all. The Bertha Ballard Home, in Indianapolis, was kept full of girls during the year at a cost of over $13,000. It did much in providing a safe and pure home for them, but many applicants were turned away for want of room. Charlton Edholm, of Oakland, Cal., spoke at some length on "The Traffic in Girls."

The Earlham Bible Institute report was received with hearty approval, but a deep concern was expressed for a course of study to supplement it, so that continuous systematic work might be carried on throughout the year. This concern was reinforced by requests from two quarterly meetings, through their select bodies, for a course of home training. A correspondence course already provided by Earlham College has proved very helpful along this line. A committee was appointed, however, to see what might be done to make the work more effective.

The Christian Endeavor meeting was the occasion for presenting proposed steps for an advance movement in missionary effort. Four lines were suggested: 1st. Securing a Missionary Library. 2d. Providing interesting missionary meetings. 3d. Organizing Missionary Study Classes. 4th. Introducing short missionary exercises once a month into the Bible schools.

The Bible school report showed substantial work done, with gains in some departments. The general dissatisfaction with the present international lesson system was brought before the meeting by the committee. They felt that the time was ripe to advocate a step in advance. In doing this they define their position to be as follows:

1. We indorse the present system of selection by the International Committee.
2. We give our sanction to no movement intended to place the selection or exposition of our lessons in the hands of any particular institution, school of thought, or set of men.
3. We do declare it as our conviction that the lessons should present the text of the scripture, in a graded and connected form, and that the entire work of the selection, exposition and teaching should be modified in a conservative manner in the light of the best educational thought.

The subjects of Peace, Good Literature, Missions, Temperance and Education received due attention. The following resolution passed unanimously:

Having heard from the Associated Press reports of the proposed law for the Philippines, published Eighth month 6th, we earnestly petition President Theodore Roosevelt to prevent by executive order the dishonor of the Christian nation from falling below a heathen nation and that Japan's law on opium, or one as strict, shall be the law in the Philippines.

The resolution will be sent to Washington at once by the yearly meeting. An interesting feature about the Earlham College report was the fact that 183, or about one-half the total number enrolled last year were Friends.

Extracts from the minute on the state of the Church show that "the spiritual condition of a large part of the membership is good." "Four of the reports make mention of an increase of interest in spiritual matters." "In five of the quarterly meetings the Sabbath services are generally well attended with an increase of attendance in some cases." "Some of the reports make special favorable mention of the work of the Christian Endeavor Society."

The report on Evangelistic and Church Extension work revealed the fact that the needs in that department were beyond the supply of available workers. Yet two more meetings were supplied with pastors this year than last, while the spirit for home missions increased, and thirty-seven young men and women gave evidence of a call to the ministry. The statistics show a slight net gain in membership, which, however, is more than offset by apparent losses. Thomas C. Brown was reappointed General Superintendent.

Probably the most helpful service of the yearly meeting was the address of Prof. Elbert Russell, on "Quaker Literature." It was a historical review of that subject, showing that early Friends were prolific writers, but that their works were practically unknown to progressive Friends. The Church was saved from death by stagnation in the revival, thirty years ago, but it lost a large part of its conservative members and with them the old Friends' literature. They then borrowed much that was not Friendly. Thus the present condition of Quaker Literature was introduced, and with it an earnest plea for Western Yearly Meeting to furnish consecrated intellect to help revive the original message of Quakerism and put it into modern literature.

Some Views on Present Topics.

OUR MESSAGE.

BY EDWIN I. NILES.

In the rise of the Society, Friends had a very clear message. There was something its ministry stood for, and there was something it arrayed itself against. They declared that every soul has immediate access to God through Jesus Christ, and that God has immediate access to every soul, and communicates himself to it. This was an appeal to the conscience, because it brought every man face to face with God. They preached against every form of humanitarianism, from the worldly honor that is given one by another, in manner of address, etc., to the bold pretensions of the clergy that there are great spiritual blessings which the believer can only receive through him as a mediating priest. This unshackled and aroused the conscience, and this was the realm in which they worked. They preached to the consciences of men, as perhaps no other followers of Christ have ever done since the early days of Christianity.

But we have lost our message, and instead of reclaiming it—and it never was more needed than now—we have gone out after the blessing-seeker's gospel, which was so warmly advocated by John Wesley, an Arminian. We have also received the Calvinistic, antinomian doctrine of the second coming of Christ, so well mapped out that every one may understand it in all its details. Not satisfied with this, we have to some extent accepted that combination of Calvinism and Wesleyanism made ready for use by the Christian Alliance and known as the "four-fold gospel."

But there is little in all of this that appeals to the conscience.

The second coming of Christ, divine healing, justification and sanctification as they are taught, go far to promote that which, after all, is outward and sensual. It is a work done largely in the realm of sensation. The senses of sight and feeling are by far too prominent. Even in the higher state of grace, wave after wave of glory sweep over the body of him who receives the endowment of power. Methodists were told at their late Quadrennial Conference that Methodism was "God-consciousness." That undoubtedly is Methodism, but it stops far too short. It is satisfied with feeling God. It is God in the realm of sensation. To sense a thing is but a low relation after all. We may be sensible of the presence of electricity, but God must have a higher relation to us than that.

Wesleyanism with the gospel of the blessing-seeker has always addressed itself to the feelings. One must first feel bad, feel his lost condition, and then it holds out to him the blessings, one and two. And the thought of blessing is so paramount that it disciplines and cultivates the desires, the longings and the emotions of the heart to such an extent that it becomes the promoter of selfishness, sometimes open and manifest, at other times concealed, yet dangerous.

Its tendency is always to that type of Christians "who seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Its adherents are on the lookout for the good things for their own interests. They will go to meeting if they can have as good, or better, time there than elsewhere; if not, they will stay at home. If it is to their interest to work for the Master they will do so, oftentimes with great zeal; but when they think that it is not they cease to work and become traitors to the cause.

LESSON II.

TENTH MONTH 9, 1904.

THE WIDOW'S OIL INCREASED.

2 Kings 4: 1-7.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.—Ps. 37: 3.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Tenth mo. 3.—The widow's oil increased. 2 Kings 4: 1-7.

Third-day, Tenth mo. 4.—Elisha's prophecy. 2 Kings 3: 1-17.

Fourth-day, Tenth mo. 5.—The prophecy fulfilled. 2 Kings 3: 20-27.

Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 8.—Faith and works. Jas. 2: 14-26.

First-day, Tenth mo. 9.—A great debt forgiven. Matt. 19: 21-27.

Time.—Somewhere about 845 B.C.

Place.—Unknown, but apparently where there was a school of the prophets; hence, possibly, Bethel, Gilgal or Jericho.

Rulers.—Jehoram, son of Ahab, king of Israel; Joram (Jehoram), king of Judah.

As noted in the last lesson, Elisha was almost the exact opposite of Elijah. Even in dress he was different, for, though he had received the "hairy mantle" of Elijah, he does not seem to have worn it. As has been said, "there was the same difference of dress and habit between him and Elijah as there was many centuries later between Jesus and John the Baptist." At the same time Elisha did not hesitate to reprove, and even denounce, when occasion demanded. See 2 Kings 3: 13; 6: 32. He was also fully as independent. 2 Kings 5: 10.

1. "A certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets." It is not exactly known what position the sons of the prophets occupied, but it is clear that it did not withdraw them from domestic life. It is not unlikely that they were for the most part members of the tribe of Levi, who spent part of their time in fitting themselves to become religious teachers. "Unto Elisha." This shows that he was considered the head of the "sons of the prophets." "My husband is dead." Tradition says that he was Obadiah, Ahab's steward (1 Kings 18: 3), but there is no evidence whatsoever for the opinion. "Did fear the Lord." Was a worshiper of Jehovah. "The creditor is come to take unto him my two sons." In ancient times in almost all countries the fathers had absolute power over their children, and could sell them for debt if so inclined, and children could be seized for parents' debts. The Levitical law recognized the power, but set a limit to it by the establishment of the "year of Jubilee" (Lev. 25: 39-41; Exod. 21: 7; 22: 2). Compare Matt. 18: 25.

2. "What hast thou in the house?" He wished to know her exact circumstances. "A pot of oil." Olive oil. Then, as now, olive oil was one of the most important household articles in an Oriental house. It was used instead of butter, for anointing, for lighting, for cooking. Altogether olive oil was perhaps the most useful vegetable product. The trees bore every other year, and from the dead branches and those cut off for trimming most of the firewood was obtained.

3. "Go borrow." He gave her something to do. The command also tried her faith, and perhaps gave some idea of what he was about to do.

4. "And thou shalt go in, and shut the door." After they had collected all the vessels the door was to be shut. There was to be no display, and there was to be no interruption. It was not to be for the general benefit, but for that of the widow and her children. "Shalt pour into all those vessels." Another test of her faith to speak thus when there was no sign of oil. "Set aside that which is full." The reason was to be given later.

5. The woman and her sons obeyed simply and fully. All had their share in the work. "She poured out." That is, from her own pot of oil. The narrative is brief, but we can imagine what must have been the feelings of the woman as she raised her small pot of oil and began to pour.

6. "When the vessels were full." The vessels which she had borrowed from her neighbors. "Her son." It seems strange that the plural should not be used here as elsewhere, but doubtless she spoke to the son who had brought the last vessel to her. "There is not a vessel more." The prophet had said, "Borrow not a few," but she had not secured enough. "And the oil stayed." That is, ceased to flow. When the supply of vessels was exhausted then the supply of oil stopped. She had herself put a limit on the amount of oil. Her faith was great, but, had it been greater, the amount of oil would have been larger. The supply of oil was exhaustless, but there was not room to receive it. So is it with God's grace; it is limited only by man's capacity to receive it. Man must do his part; if he does not have faith, if he does not do his part by opening his heart, he cannot expect to have the blessing. Had the woman borrowed fewer vessels she would have received less oil; had she borrowed more, she would have received more.

7. "Came and told the man of God." She wished to acknowledge the blessing she had received to the one through whom she had received it. It is likely, also, that she did not feel that the oil was her own. "Go, sell the oil," etc. She was to be relieved of all her difficulties. "Live thou and thy sons of the rest." That is, of the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the oil. The widow and her sons were not to be confined to a diet of oil only. God does not skimp His blessings. The money would enable them to live until her sons secured employment.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "According to your faith, be it unto you."
2. "Faith without works is dead."
3. The widow's temporary needs were supplied; after that the living was to be earned. God does not support His followers in idleness.

It is said that one of our multimillionaires, on being asked how he became wealthy, replied: "Oh, it was no trouble after the first million." Men naturally use money and strength and influence to indulge and enlarge and intrench themselves, and "their great ones exercise authority over them." Christ's standard of greatness and achievement has always been a revelation and an astonishment to the world. busy at its own promotion and using power to get more power.

Paul was speaking almost in our Lord's own words when he said: "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." But do not earnest Christians sometimes allow themselves to become impatient with those whose lives fall short of the standard that they feel is set up for all? The way is so clear to the faith-filled believer, the deliverance so near at hand, and the triumph so exhilarating, that the poor struggler, conscious of conspicuous faults, is hardly so much sympathized with as reproached for not accepting more fully the proffered grace which he has as yet failed to realize.

Harder even than forbearance and sympathy with the one who is conscious of his shortcomings is the going out in the right spirit to the Laodicean whose life is not awakened to know his poverty and nakedness, but who, in the midst of it all, says: "I am rich and have need of nothing." Yet the message of the Living One to such as these was: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," and surely He intends that His children to-day shall somehow find access to them in their unknown lack, and free them of their burden of worldly efficiency and ensnaring desires. Indifferent as they may be, we cannot be indifferent and unburdened concerning them and still fulfill the law of Christ.

In behalf of the younger members of our Societies we may consider how we can make it easier for them in their timidity and inexperience to begin the work which they must some time undertake. The atmosphere of encouragement for obedient service even if stammering and imperfect, is easily discernible if present, and the little word of appreciation that we are too apt to keep for obituary use would often be sufficient to cheer a younger companion at a time when it might mean much.

It is not enough to say that each one must be sure of his own leading, and be faithful in the duty laid upon him. The vocal exercise is for the Church, and the Church may know and should know whether it meets a need; and the messenger, younger or older, ought to be assured that the burden that he or she may bear is not borne alone.

"MILLION RIFLEMEN WANTED."

BY WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Non-combatants and advocates of international arbitration will be interested in the following extract from the Philadelphia "Public Ledger" of Eighth month 1st, 1904:

"The National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, under authority of the War Department, has announced the plan for the formation of a national reserve of qualified riflemen, the main points of which are as follows:

"All members of the National Rifle Association and of affiliated organizations are eligible to compete. They must be citizens between the ages of 18 and 45. The United States magazine rifle, or a rifle viewed and stamped by the National Rifle Association, must be used, together with the United States service ammunition or private makes that come within the rules. All those who qualify will receive a national marksman's button.

"Introducing this subject, the board points out that as our permanent military establishment, or regular army, must be small, in the event of a war with one or more of the first-class Powers of the world we must depend very largely upon the militia and the volunteers for our fighting force. With the modern long-range small arms, it is all important that the soldier should know how to shoot, and to hit what he shoots at. If he cannot do this, the chances are ten to one that the shot is lost.

"By the plan proposed," says the report of the board, "we believe that the United States will within a few years have more than 1,000,000 men who will have on the line of battle nearly all requirements for the most efficient soldiers in the world. . . . That is, we propose to educate our young men and boys over 15 years of age to be an army of expert rifle shots. . . . To those who are accustomed to the use of fire-arms, we believe one thing is evident beyond all question, and it is that a high degree of skill in rifle and revolver shooting, and the confidence which a knowledge of this skill gives, will make a timid man brave and a brave man more courageous."

"It is recommended that this practice should be obtained by means of shooting galleries and field ranges, and that in erecting armories for the National Guard additional range facilities be provided.

"The plan was devised by a committee of the board, of which General W. H. Hall, United States Army; General Bird W. Spencer, President of the National Rifle Association, and I. A. Haskell, Vice-President of the National Rifle Association, were members. It has been approved by Secretary of War Taft and officially promulgated by the War Department."

From the above it will be seen that the government at Washington is proceeding to indirectly enlarge the military efficiency of the United States beyond the regular army now limited by law to 100,000 men.

Our young men are encouraged in rifle practice with the definite purpose of learning how to kill their fellow-men. A "National Reserve" is to be formed which, as regards actual intent and development, is in many respects to be similar to an important adjunct of the vast military systems of Europe. The ultimate effect will be to discourage peace principles and substitute therefore a familiarity with military usage. It is the natural precursor of a still further enlarged army before many years hence.

May not members of the Society of Friends awaken to the value of their testimony regarding this subject? Can they not practically intervene and speak for Christ by individually writing to the Executive at Washington a few lines expressive of their disapprobation? How is the government to know of our views if we keep quiet?

TO THE MEMBERS OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

Dear Friends: Those who contribute to the Evangelistic and Church Extension work of New York Yearly Meeting on First-day, Tenth month 2d, will doubtless recognize that under the present well-organized conditions the only limitation for effective service is that of funds.

The General Superintendent is in close touch with all the needs of the various meetings.

Efficient ministers have been secured from Maine, Ohio, Illinois and Michigan.

Twelve new meetings for worship are held by Friends. Five of these in meeting houses previously closed.

Three Bible Schools have been started, and one Christian Endeavor Society organized.

Twenty series of special evangelistic services have been held, and 2,276 have publicly expressed their desire to follow Christ.

Quarterly and monthly meetings have increased in interest and attendance.

Workers have been encouraged, and their gifts recognized by the church.

Meeting house property and parsonages have been finished, enlarged or improved, but the good work is only well begun.

During thirteen months to Ninth month 1st, 1904, the General Superintendent has attended 506 meetings, visited 1,093 families and traveled 10,911 miles.

Funds are needed to assist seven meetings now without Friend ministers.

The obligations already assumed by the committee must be met.

One dollar now will be of more value than two later. Give as the Lord has prospered you.

Contributions to be sent to William C. Taber, treasurer, 173 Chambers Street, New York.

ELMER D. GILDERSLEEVE, Chairman.

CHARLES W. LAWRENCE, Secretary.

Committee on Evangelistic and Church Extension Work of New York Yearly Meeting.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Harry Hayes and wife have taken up pastoral work in the meeting at Upland, Ind.

Charles S. White will be located in pastoral work at Earlham, Iowa, during the coming year.

Fred Smith and wife, formerly pastors in the meeting at Farmland, Ind., are now located at Spiceland, Ind.

Loretta Pim, Malinda Hunt and Emma F. Coffin expect to engage in evangelistic work in Iowa Yearly Meeting as way may open.

Levi Mills, after attending Wilmington and Iowa Yearly Meetings, returned to his home in Whittier, Cal.

Alexander Anderson, a graduate of Penn College, will serve as pastor in the meeting at Spencer the coming year.

Clarence McClean will do pastoral work at Center, Iowa, in connection with his school work at Penn College this year.

George Taylor has moved his family from Whittier, Cal., to Alamitos, Cal., where he will serve as pastor in the meeting.

Horace W. Holding, with several members of the China Mission Band from the training school, conducted a Sabbath evening service for Friends at Whittier, Cal., recently.

Raymond S. Holding recently held a special service for children in the mission chapel at Banos, Cuba, in which twenty-three children were presented for associate members.

Zenas L. Martin is visiting the yearly meeting assemblies in the interest of the American Friends Foreign Missionary Board, and his wife, Susie Martin, is stopping with friends in Tennessee.

Lucy J. Rogers, of New Sharon, Iowa, served as caretaker at Iowa Yearly Meeting this year for the twenty-second time. She must feel much at home while acting as a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord.

Alvin Coppock, superintendent of Evangelistic Work in Stella Quarterly Meeting, Okla., reports a need for pastors at Friends' Valley, Bethel, Liberty, Alva and Sunny Side. Will those who read these lines pray for the work?

F. C. Carter has just closed three years of pastoral work at Fall Creek, near New Petersburg, Ohio. The meeting is the banner meeting in the quarter for attendance. F. C. Carter has been asked to remain another year, but he has not yet fully decided to do so.

Five thousand dollars have been raised toward the new Industrial Training School for the Boys, Palestine, and Timothy B. Hussey has been selected by the New England Mission Board to go to Ramallah the coming winter to select the site and assist in purchasing the needed land.

In a recent letter from President Edwin McGrew, he says: "Pacific College never had so good prospects as for the coming year. Much work has been done on the college and grounds, and everything is in splendid condition. More students are headed this way than ever before, I am sure."

Stella Friends' Academy opened the 6th inst., with John Howard as principal and Alta Howard and George A. Wright as assistants. Forty-eight students are enrolled. Prospects are good for several more soon. A number of needed improvements have been made at a cost of from $1,200 to $1,500.

The monthly meeting at Coldwater, Okla., occurred the 10th inst. Susie Allen and Laura A. Coppock were present. They also held fourteen other services, which resulted in quite an awakening. The friends are few at this point, but they are anxious to have a revival and a pastor to look after the work. Will not some one hear the Macedonian cry?

Manuel S. Freyre, the younger of the two young men from Cuba, who have spent the last two years in Oakwood Seminary, N. Y., after two years in the mission school at Gibara, Cuba, has returned home on account of the serious illness of his father. We trust that the Saviour to whom he consecrated himself while in the seminary will use him to the advancement of his kingdom in the island of his birth.

The friends at Mt. Airy, N. C., have a neat, commodious meeting house, nearly completed, built of Mt. Airy granite. The meeting is small, and they have made a noble effort to provide this place for worship, which was very much needed. There will be a debt of several hundred dollars to be canceled. Any one feeling led to contribute to this can remit to C. G. Welch, treasurer, or Leverett J. Rugg. The total cost of building and lot will be about $3,500.

Glens Falls Monthly Meeting, N. Y., was very much encouraged by the announcement that the indebtedness on the parsonage had been liquidated, freeing the entire meeting property from debt. The meeting has been steadily growing under its faithful pastor, Abijah J. Weaver, who does not let a call for help or encouragement go without care. His special meetings at Oneida, where the meeting house has been closed for some years, have been largely attended, and hopes for regular services are again entertained. The Friends at Glens Falls have been much helped by the visit of Amos Sanders, of Brooklyn, who spent several weeks in the town, as well as ministers from other meetings, who have been with them from time to time.

Cleo Monthly Meeting, Okla., which occurred the 10th inst., was held in the new meeting house, which was all completed, except seating. This building represents much sacrifice upon the part of a few friends. One Friend, Aaron Kellem, has done most of the work. He has worked on it the most of the past year, besides giving $50 in money. If any one has any of the Lord's money that they wish to use for seating this building they should send it to Aaron Kellem, Cleo, O. T.

Our friend, Timothy Nicholson, of Richmond, has been selected as one of the Jurors of the educational exhibit at the St. Louis Exposition. The Jurors are divided into eight groups, with seven persons in a group, and a certain section of the exhibit is put under each group. Timothy Nicholson has been selected as chairman of his group, which has charge of special forms of education—text-books, books for teachers, school furniture and appliances. Their duties will keep them until about the 21st inst.

Juan Francisco Galvez, a recorded minister, stationed as assistant in the Friends' Mission at Banos, Cuba, recently made an evangelistic trip on horseback to the port of Sama and four neighboring villages, which are the center of two rich fruit companies. Gospel services were held in four of these towns, with attendance of from 40 to 150. Almost all the families were visited, Bibles and portions sold, and tracts distributed. The inhabitants heard for the first time the full gospel of Jesus Christ.

Hiram S. Wollam has just closed his third pastoral year with Friends at Smithfield, Ohio. Accompanied by his wife, he leaves for work within the limits of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. Their labor and work at Smithfield had but one aim, that to preach the Gospel of Christ and the upbuilding of His church. They will be greatly missed not only by the church, but by the entire community. The prayers and good wishes of many friends will follow him and his family as they leave for other fields of service.

In a communication from Seth Brown, Richmond, Ind., he says: "I desire to express my appreciation and hearty approval of the article by Mead A. Kelsey entitled, 'The Church at Play,' printed in THE AMERICAN FRIEND some months ago, and I am glad that there is one Friend who is so well able to express himself, and who has the courage to do so. The church is called the bride, the Lamb's wife, and she ought to be holy, harmless and undefiled." He goes on to express his disapproval of "various kinds of church fairs and entertainments to induce people to come to meeting."

At New Garden Quarterly Meeting, held the 10th inst., at Greensboro, N. C., Albert Peele, a minister of the quarterly meeting, preached about the church being the body of Christ. The noon repast and social hour in the meeting house with Greensboro Friends was well improved and enjoyed. The clerk, F. S. Blair, called the meeting for business promptly at 1 p.m. The representatives to yearly meeting reported the printed minutes received and divided between the two monthly meetings. A recommendation from the quarterly meeting on ministry and oversight to hold their meeting at 10 o'clock, and to close at the noon recess on the same day with the quarterly meeting was agreed to for one year. The quarterly meeting is thus to meet in the afternoon. A missionary conference was arranged for on Seventh-day evening of the meeting in Twelfth month. The meeting adjourned to meet at Guilford College.

Whittier College, Cal., was the subject of an excellent write-up which appeared in the Los Angeles "Times," and was reprinted in the "Whittier Register." We clip the following: "Prof. Rayner W. Kelsey, a recent acquisition to the faculty, has had large experience and great success in training young men and women for public speaking. Young Miles, who the past season won the Oregon State prohibition contest, the Pacific Coast Interstate contest, and the national contest at Indianapolis, was under Prof. Kelsey's care throughout his entire course. Prof. O. C. Albertson, formerly of Pacific College, Oregon, brings to the department of science a large experience with a fine record for thoroughness and originality. Whittier College also adds a new professor of Latin, in the person of Ellen C. Keats, of Mt. Holyoke, Mass. Ellen C. Keats recently took the honors in a class of 128. The foothill Quaker city is proud of its college, and of its educational outlook."

Stella Quarterly Meeting was held at Cherokee, O. T., Ninth month 2d, 3d and 4th. Lealdas Mardock was present from Pleasant View Quarterly Meeting, Kansas. The responsibility of each member of the church was brought before the meeting of ministry and oversight. The subject considered in the doctrinal meeting was the need of pastoral work in Stella Quarterly Meeting. It was discussed by Nathan Brown, John Snively and others. Seventh-day evening a temperance meeting was conducted by Brother and Sister Hill, of Wichita. Ministering messages were given by Josiah Dillon and Lealdas Mardock. All the monthly meetings, nine in number, reported on statistics. The superintendent of Christian Endeavor conducted the evening meeting. Sabbath morning the quarterly meeting Bible School was held at 9 o'clock. At 10 o'clock the word was given by John Snively and Lealdas Mardock. At the close many came forward for consecration. At 3 o'clock the subject was "Paying What We Owe."

The session of the Cottonwood Quarterly Meeting next preceding the Kansas Yearly Meeting was held at the Cottonwood Meeting House, six miles west of Emporia, on the 16th to 18th inst. The summary of the reports from the local meetings was good, showing the Quarter (in the main) to be in a good spiritual condition. The meeting expressed itself to request the yearly meeting to change the time of holding the yearly meeting sessions to the week just before the opening of the Friends' University at Wichita. This is done in order to give the students an opportunity to attend the yearly meeting sessions. It also considered, at the request of J. Edwin Jay, the advisability of holding a Biblical institute. The subject was referred to the Evangelistic Board to report at the next quarterly meeting. The temperance and missionary interests were given each a night session, which were profitably used. The outgoing clerks, Brother Painter, of Barclay, and Sister Stout, of Cottonwood, who have so faithfully served the quarterly meeting, were given a vote of thanks. The audiences were large and interest good. Asher Mott, the veteran preacher of the cross, who is now beyond the threescore and ten, gave a most edifying sermon on Seventh-day morning. Brother Overman, one of God's aged saints, spoke several times. Josiah Butler, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, was present with his wise and judicial counsel.

Iowa Yearly Meeting has a large number of meetings in which pastors are employed. The following is the list as reported at the yearly meeting. It will be interesting to many and convenient for reference: Wm. Brenner, Templeton, S. D.; Allen H. Briggs, Glenwood, Iowa; Howard F. Brown, Earlham, Iowa; D. J. Events and Comments.

According to recent dispatches, the revolutionists of Paraguay are concentrating their land forces at towns parallel with the railway, and have cut off supplies and communications with Asuncion. It is evident that the revolutionists are planning to make an early attack upon the capital or to starve the government into submission.

The intense heat of the last six weeks has had an extraordinary effect on the Alps. Great crags and peaks of rock are emerging on summits which never before in the memory of living man have been free from snow. Huge masses of ice are continually breaking away and falling with thunderous echoes into the valleys and ravines, and avalanches have never before been so numerous or extensive.

Mt. Vesuvius is again quite active, and the eruption is the most grandly spectacular of any witnessed during the past ten years. One evening last week the crust around the crater broke away, giving vent to magnificent showers of red-hot ashes and sparks of fire, which rose at times in immense columns to the height of 700 feet. After that there were frequent eruptions, accompanied by loud detonations and earthquakes, the sound resembling a bombardment by heavy artillery.

Russia's protest against England's new treaty with Thibet is timely, yet it will not make England halt. These rival powers have a sweet way of stealing a march when one or the other is in trouble. During the Boer war, Russia had her way all over Asia, from Persia to Manchuria. Now it is England's turn, and she lands promptly in Thibet. The joke is that both solemnly asseverate through thick and thin their purpose to maintain the integrity of the Chinese Empire. For Thibet is as much a part of that Empire as Manchuria.

The birth of a son to Queen Helena and King Victor Emanuel III., who has been given the title of Prince of Piedmont—not Prince of Rome—has brought delight not only to the royal couple, but also to the loyal subjects of the realm. Like the Czarina of Russia, Queen Helena had been prolific in daughters. The king and the people wished for a son for reasons of State. The choice of title for the heir-apparent shows that the royal family is disposed to meet Pope Pius X. in an effort to diminish feeling between the Crown and the Roman Church.

Everything now depends upon the corn crop, whether the country is to find the cost of bread tolerable during the coming year. If that crop also fails us, the present high prices of wheat must prove moderate and reasonable. The government report of September 1st conditions indicated a corn harvest of 2,490,000,000 bushels—next to the largest yield ever grown. But there has since been some damage inflicted by a frost, and another frost scare was influencing the grain markets recently. At the same time the crop experts are appearing with uniform predictions of a greatly reduced yield.

A commission of eminent Armenian ecclesiastics, delegated by the Supreme Patriarch of the Armenian Church to visit the chief representatives of the great Powers and appeal for action compelling the Sultan of Turkey to cease persecuting the Armenians, has set sail for this country. In England they have had a cordial reception from the dignitaries of the Church of England, and Lord Lansdowne, head of the Foreign Office, has given them a respectful hearing. Here they expect to see the President and Secretary Hay; and at the coming Peace Congress and the Protestant Episcopal General Convention in Boston next month they will have an opportunity to state their case to many influential citizens of this and other lands.

WHY THE CLAIM WAS NOT PRESSED.

"No," said the lawyer, "I shan't press your claim against that man. You can get someone else to take the case, or you can withdraw it, just as you please."

"Think there isn't any money in it?"

"There would probably be a little money in it, but it would come from the sale of the little house the man occupies and calls his 'home.' But I don't want to meddle with the matter, anyhow."

"Got frightened out of it, eh?"

"Not at all."

"I suppose the old fellow begged to be let off?"

"Well, yes; he did."

"And you caved in, likely?"

"Yes."

"What in creation did you do?"

"I believe I shed a few tears."

"The old fellow begged you hard, you say?"

"No, I didn't say so; he didn't speak a word to me."

"Well, may I ask whom did he address in your hearing?"

"God Almighty."

"He took to praying, did he?"

"Not for my benefit in the least. You see, I found the little house easily enough, and knocked on the outer door, which stood ajar, but nobody heard me; so I stepped into the little hall, and saw, through the crack of the door, a cozy sitting-room, and, there on the bed, with her silver head high on the pillows was an old lady who looked for all the world just like my mother did the last time I saw her on earth. Well, I was on the point of knocking again, when she said: 'Come, father, now begin; I am all ready.' Down on his knees by her side went the old white-haired man, still older than his wife, I should judge; and I couldn't have knocked then for the life of me. Well, he began. First he reminded God that they were still his submissive children, mother and he, and, no matter what he saw fit to bring upon them, they should not rebel against his will. Of course, it was going to be hard for them to go out homeless in their old age, especially with poor mother so sick and helpless; and oh, how different it might have been if only one of the boys had been spared! Then his voice kind o' broke, and a thin, white hand stole from under the coverlid, and moved softly over his snowy hair. Then he went on to repeat that nothing could ever be so sharp again as the parting with those three sons—unless mother and he should be separated! But at last he fell to comforting himself with the fact that the good Lord knew that it was through no fault of his own that mother and he were threatened with the loss of their dear little home, which meant beggary and the almshouse—a place they prayed to be delivered from, if it could be consistent with God's will. And then he quoted a multitude of promises concerning the safety of those who put their trust in the Lord. In fact, it was the most thrilling plea to which I ever listened. At last he prayed for God's blessing on those about to demand justice."

Then the lawyer continued, more slowly than ever, "And—I—believe I had rather go to the poorhouse myself to-night than to stain my hands and heart with the blood of such a prosecution as that."

"Little afraid to defeat the old man's prayer, eh?"

"Bless your soul, man, you couldn't defeat that prayer. I tell you he left it all subject to the will of God; but he claimed that we were told to make known our desires to him. But, of all the pleading I ever heard, that moved me most. You see, I was taught that kind of thing myself in my childhood, and why I was sent to hear that prayer I am sure I don't know—but I hand the case over."

"I wish," said the client uneasily, "I wish you hadn't told me about the old man's prayer."

"Why so?"

"Well, because I want the money the place would bring. I was taught the Bible straight enough when I was a youngster, and I hate to run counter to what you tell me about it. I wish you had not heard a word about it; another time I would not listen to petitions not intended for my ears."

The lawyer smiled.

"My dear fellow," he said, "you are wrong again. It was intended for my ears and yours too; and God Almighty intended it. My old mother used to sing about 'God moves in a mysterious way,' I remember."

"Well, my mother used to sing it too," said the client, and he twisted the claim papers in his fingers. "You can call in the morning, if you like, and tell 'mother and him' the claim has been met."

"In a mysterious way," added the lawyer.—Selected.

YEARLY MEETINGS IN 1904.

IT'S "GOT" TO BE.

"When it's got to be,"—like I always say,

As I notice the years whiz past,
And know each day is a yesterday,
When we size it up at last,—
Same as I said when my boyhood went
And I knowed we had to quit,—
"It's got to be, and it's goin' to be!"
So I said "Good-by" to it.

It's got to be, and it's goin' to be!
So at least I always try
To kind o' say in a hearty way,—
"Well, it's got to be, Good-by!"

The time just melts like a late, last snow,—

When it's got to be, it melts!
But I am to keep a cheerful mind,
Ef I can't keep nothin' else!
I knowed, when I come to twenty-one,
That I'd soon be twenty-two,—
So I waved one hand at the soft young man,
And I said, "Good-by to you!"

It's got to be, and it's goin' to be!
So at least I always try
To kind o' say in a cheerful way,—
"Well, it's got to be. Good by!"

They kep' a goin', the years and years,
Yet still I smiled and smiled,—
For I'd said "Good-by" to my single life,

And I had a wife and child;
Mother and son and the father—one,—
Till, last on her bed of pain,
She jes' smiled up, like, she always done,—
And I said "Good-by" again.

It's got to be, and it's goin' to be!
So at least I always try
To kind o' say in a humble way,—
"Well, it's got to be. Good-by."

And then my boy—as he growed to be Almost a man in size,—
Was more than a pride and joy to me,
With his mother's smiling eyes,—
He gimme the slip when the war broke out,
And followed me. And I Never knowed till the first fight's end—
I found him, and then,—"Good-by."

It's got to be, and it's going to be!
So at least I always try
To kind o' say, in a patient way,
"Well, it's got to be. Good-by!"

I have said, "Good-by!—Good-by!— Good-by!"

With my very best good will.
All through life from the first, and I Am a cheerful old man still;
But it's got to end, and it's goin' to end!
And this is the thing I'll do—
With my last breath I will laugh, O Death,
And say "Good-by" to you!—

We lose the zest of living because we fail to assimilate our blessings. All that comes to us is, in some way, intended for us. But, like apples which rot upon the trees, they are lost to us because we failed to use them in time. We weep under the outspread branches of our dead mercies when we might have been rejoicing in their luxurious fruits.

Gold production in the Alaskan region of the United States and Canada during the season now closing has amounted to about $26,000,000, according to unofficial estimates. This compares with an output of $26,421,000 last year, $29,100,000 in 1902, and $31,357,000 in 1901. Evidently production in that quarter of the world has passed the maximum, and this within little more than half a dozen years of the discoveries.

Statistics have recently been compiled abroad which show that the total tonnage of the world's merchant marine is now 33,643,000 tons, divided between 12,182 sailing ships and 12,671 steamers. These figures show that the world's goods are still carried in rather small ships, in spite of the recent increase in big-ship building. There are only 89 merchantmen that have a tonnage of over 10,000. England, of course, leads the world in total tonnage with 16,006,374, and America is next with 3,671,956, while Germany has 3,283,247; Norway,

He will institute a more rigid police surveillance for their protection and bring in more liberal laws, allowing Jews to engage in certain vocations and professions from which they have been excluded heretofore.

Senator George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts, died at his home in Worcester the morning of the 30th ult. He was a scholar, a moralist, and a statesman. He belonged to the old-fashioned sturdy New England type of men. He was an idealist, not merely by profession, but in practice, and was in his public career attorney for the people and their representative. He as a public servant was an honor to America. His life was open and good. His real public career began thirty-seven years ago with his election to the House of Representatives. At that time he was one of the leading and rising lawyers of the State, and had a private fortune of $100,000; last year, after a lifetime during which he gave his best energies to the public in House and Senate, he mortgaged his little possessions to pay for his modest Washington home.

Yom Kippur, the survival of an ancient Hebrew feast, which occurs in Ninth month, is celebrated by orthodox Jews throughout the world, completing the season of the Jewish new year. The day, in its real significance, is one of penitence and fasting. In every synagogue of the Ghettoes of the East Side, of New York, and in Chicago, the American observance was conducted. Jews, wearing the robes they will be buried in, taronged to the temples, where they sat with their hats on during the day. As offenses against man, according to the rite, cannot be pardoned without the full forgiveness of the injured party, all disputes and feuds are made up on the day preceding the atonement day. It is a solemn moment for the Jews, as the Hebrew Word is taken from the holy of holies as of old, and read from. It is the day the fate of man is sealed. Even the angels tremble on this annual judgment day, for only penance can avert the evil decree of God. On new year's morn the Book of Life is

The spirit of war is being displayed in its most aggravated form in the siege of Port Arthur. Both Japanese and Russians have ceased to pay any attention to the rules of war, and neither hospitals nor flags of truce are respected by either army. The feeling between the combatants had become so bitter that neither can expect to receive quarter. Prince Radzivil tells of two Japanese battalions which found themselves at the mercy of the Russians in one of the assaults on the fortress. They hoisted the white flag, but to this the Russians paid no attention and continued to fire on them. In the meantime the Japanese in the rear of the companies that had hoisted the white flag fired on their comrades, in indignation at their offer of surrender. As a result of this cross-fire six hundred men were shot down. The dead fell among the bodies of victims of previous assaults. For days, says the Prince, the wounded men raised fluttering handkerchiefs in pleas for help, but neither friend nor foe went to their assistance. Among the heaps of dead the lieutenant saw two soldiers, one a Russian and the other a Japanese, lying in a death grip. The teeth of the Japanese were buried in the Russian's throat, while the Russian had forced two fingers into the eye sockets of his antagonist.

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

IN THE MORNING.

BY LINDLEY M. STEVENS.

When the night shall fall behind us,
And the morning light shall find us;
And the glass that showeth darkly shall reflect an image true;

We shall speak the words unspoken
And renew the promise broken;
And the rest that now remaineth shall be given me and you.

Not to me, with words of blessing,
Doth the Spirit stand professing
That one by one they gather, when He maketh up His own;
Rather blest the dreamless slumber,
Till the Master counts the number
Of those accounted worthy to stand before the throne.

For if I, of two forgiven,
Should be first to enter heaven,
And should join the mighty chorus of the Alleluia strain,
I should listen, 'mid the thunder,
'Mid the rapture and the wonder,
For a voice that God hath promised I shall hear in heaven again.

So I dream, who am not sleeping;
So I wait, my vigil keeping;
So I read it, clearly written in the Word:
In the final consummation,
In the great regeneration,
They shall rise and stand together with the Lord.

And my spirit beareth witness, and doth say:
Only thus shall all the sighing,
Only thus shall all the crying,
Only thus shall all the dying,
Pass away.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

ONE FACT TO START WITH.

HOWEVER we may formulate our views on the atonement, however we may attempt to express our conception of the way of salvation, there is one thing which we must start with and end with: God has always loved us; there was never any need of anything to change His attitude toward us.

It seems strange that it should be necessary to state such a simple truth of Christianity as that—a truth which shines out even in the Old Testament—but a zeal to work out a logical doctrine of the atonement has sometimes led persons of the very best intention to forget or to ignore it. In their earnestness for their doctrine they speak as though Christ's coming and His death first made divine mercy and love possible and real. By the transaction on Calvary God was changed from "a God of wrath" to "a God of Grace." There are two great objections to such a view: (1) It is unscriptural; (2) It lowers God to the level of one of the pagan gods.

(1) God is thought of both in the Old and in the New Testaments as unchangeable and as inherently good and full of mercy. With Him there is "no variableness, neither shadow made by turning." The tenderness, the pity, the mercy, the love of God, as it swells throughout the Psalms, is as positive as it is in our Christian literature. Hardly any other piece of writing in human history has so profoundly expressed the fact of love at the heart of God as does the book of Hosea, written before the exile. One can almost feel the sobs of the great tender-hearted prophet as he rises from his own love for a wayward wife to God's love for a wayward people. The book of Jonah is mainly remarkable for the discovery of the truth that God not only loves Israel, but extends His love to such a wicked city as Nineveh—a truth which it was extremely hard for poor Jonah to learn. But the fact of God's tender love is not in the Psalms and in the Prophets alone; it is the message of Deuteronomy as well. The entire appeal of the book is based on the love and goodness of God. The writer points to fact after fact to illustrate the divine love and repeats his refrain, "Lest ye forget."

There is not a line in Gospel or Epistle which encourages the belief that God's attitude toward man has changed; that once He was a "God of wrath," but now has become "a God of Grace." The Lamb who has suffered for our salvation was slain from the foundation of the world, and the entire Bible confirms the view that God's love has no date of beginning. God is love. Love is not a late acquisition to His nature.

(2) The opposite view degrades God. It makes Him like the god of the pagan. The pagan gods are capricious and fickle. They have to be changed by the smell of incense before they will be kind or good or loving. They are not "the same yesterday, to-day and forever." In short, they are very much like the poor, changeable mortal who worships them. They are made in his image. Our God is not so. His purposes are from everlasting to everlasting. He changes not. The soul that trusts Him now may trust forever.

Christ did not make Him loving and merciful. Christ revealed to us that He is—is and was—loving and merciful. He came to show the Father. "If you see me you see the Father." Before He came men had been feeling after such a God, and a few had touched His hand in the darkness and felt the love in it—as, for instance, Hosea. Christ removed the darkness and showed that love is as essential to God as dimension is to body. From eternity to eternity He is love.

But there is another objection, no less serious to the view above stated; it makes God and Christ different persons. It implies that Christ is better and more loving than God. But the whole meaning of our salvation is bound up with the truth that God and Christ are one. This will be considered next week.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has announced that in the near future he will issue a call for a second international Peace Conference at The Hague. For the most part those who are working for the Peace of the world have received the President's announcement with enthusiasm and joy. It has, however, aroused little comment from the secular press, and it has met rather a cold response in Europe, particularly in England.

There have been some suspicions that the President's announcement was insincere and for political effect. We do not believe it. He has said many things of a warlike character, and he has gained the reputation of being bent on "strenuous" policies. He has even said that a Quaker is no better, as a citizen, than a duelist.

But men grow wiser with experience, and the President has plainly shown in his public papers, and in many more private ways, that his interest in and sympathy with peaceful methods are growing. He is by no means an ideal Peace man yet, but no more was the Russian Czar, who called the first Hague conference. He was called insincere and inconsistent, but it is now recognized that his motive was pure, and the outcome of the conference has been beyond the dreams of most. So may it be with the second one. We shall assume that the President is acting from lofty motives, and we shall look for great results to flow from his action.

THE death of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, removes from public life one of the purest and finest spirits of our generation. He began his public career with a small fortune—enough to make him independent—and ended his thirty-seven years of service at Washington a poor man, with a mortgage on his modest home. This is mentioned only to show how absolutely he was above the temptation to make his vote in House and Senate a commodity for money.

He was an orator of the old school. He brought a trained and scholarly mind to bear on all the problems of statesmanship, and, though too extremely partisan, he yet cared with all his soul for ideals. He has been the champion of many causes near the Quaker heart. May Massachusetts find another man as good!

IN ONE of our yearly meetings the Committee on Evangelistic and Church Extension Work has sent out a circular letter to the membership, to be read at the close of morning meeting on a definite First-day. In a few telling paragraphs it presents the out-reaching work of the yearly meeting, and closes with a call for funds to carry on the work. Here are a few of its sentences:

"Twelve new meetings for worship are now being held. Five of them in houses previously closed."

"Twenty series of special evangelistic meetings have been held, and 2,276 persons have publicly expressed their desire to follow Christ."

"The general superintendent has attended 506 meetings, visited 1,098 families, and traveled 10,911 miles."

WE CALL attention to a list of available lectures on various religious subjects, published in another column of this issue. Our country is so large that it is well-nigh impossible to carry on this extension work successfully all over it. But many sections can be reached by the persons who are enrolled in this list, and meetings will do well to avail themselves of the opportunity.

RELIGIOUS MEDITATION.*

BY JOHN R. MOTT.

Religious meditation is to stand before the spiritual facts and words, to exercise the faculties upon them, to draw out their lessons, to appropriate their truth, and to let them have right of way in the life. Expressed otherwise, one might say that to meditate upon spiritual things is to get into the middle of them, to live in their light, to get under their power, to let them move us. This is almost a forgotten art in these times, although there never has been a time in the history of the Church when the habit of thinking on matters pertaining to religion was more needed than it is to-day. Religious meditation is needed because of the wonderful development of the physical and material forces which characterize our time. The forces of materialism are waxing more and more.

* Substance of an address given at the Bible Training School, New York city, Fifth month, 1904. Reprinted from the "Biblical Record" by "Daily Bible."

Men are becoming increasingly intent on the things that they can see and hear and handle. Great, therefore, is the need that men be led to give more thought to the unseen, the spiritual and the abiding. Moreover, life is so complex, so intricate, so baffling, and its claims so numerous and conflicting that there is peculiar need of cultivating a life of simplicity, and this it is impossible to do without giving more time to reflection.

The spirit of strain and hurry and pressure creeps even into the devotional life of Christians. We find them regulating their spiritual exercises by the clock, and the watch, and the bell. In view of considerations like these is it not true that there is greater need to-day than ever of cultivating the habit of religious meditation? Every college, every church needs more Christians who know God at first hand, whose lives are powerfully gripped by the essentials of their faith, and who, therefore, are able more adequately to represent Jesus Christ and what He stands for in the world.

The absence of religious meditation accounts for some things which should cause us real alarm. It explains why there is so much professionalism among Christian workers. It is the cause of so much formalism among the rank and file of Christians. They profess far more than they possess. It explains the superficiality in the religious life of multitudes of church members. As a result it is not strange that they have an unsatisfactory religious experience.

What are some of the main advantages of the habit of religious meditation? In the first place, it is necessary, in order that we may discover and understand spiritual truth. Many of the great ideas of the Bible are as much hidden from us to-day beneath the guise of familiarity with the outward form of the Scriptures, as they were beneath the veil of superstition before the reformation. We need to remind ourselves of the words of the Pilgrim father that there is new light and truth to break forth from the Word of God.

Meditation is essential if one is to be so dominated by great convictions and purposes that he is always under their influence and power, and has his life plans and activities governed by them. We need to renew and strengthen constantly our impressions of the reality, and value, and wonder of the essential points of our faith. Each one of us has had experiences when the truth strongly gripped us and deeply moved us. Why should not this be a more nearly constant experience? Are my beliefs simply the views or opinions of others, or are they personal convictions formed as a result of my own spiritual insight and thought? With far too many of us our faith is a traditional matter. If our faith is to move our lives and quicken our energies it must be our own. Meditation makes religious truth vivid, real, vital, commanding. James Lewis has said: "Our aims follow our thoughts. To look at a thing is to live in it and by it." In every one of our communities we need Christians who have more depth of conviction. It is this kind of men who are the leaders and on whom other Christians to-day are relying. We need men who are not only living by the truth, but who are held so strongly by it that they would be willing to die for it.

If our lives are to be truly communicative and therefore of largest helpfulness to others we must cultivate constantly the practice of meditation. We must first see things clearly ourselves before we can proclaim them with power to others. Henry Drummond used to instruct his student missionaries, whom he sent out to conduct meetings in different communities in Scotland, not to speak things which they had not experienced and which they did not believe. This was also his own practice, and goes far to explain the secret of his deep influence. In listening to his words and observing his life you always had the impression that here was a man who did not talk ahead of his beliefs. The men who most mightily stir others spiritually are those who are constantly catching fresh visions of God and of His truth and purpose.

Let us devote sufficient time to meditation, as well as a regular time. It takes time to believe. We must first take time to hear God before we are able to trust Him as fully as we should. It requires both mental leisure and activity to trace the great thoughts and plans of God. Poverty of modern Christian life will not be cured until more time and intensity is devoted to meditation. And here let me enter a plea for prolonged attention to religious matters from time to time. Edison hit on some of his greatest inventions at the end of long periods of earnest thought. He became so absorbed in the problem before him that he forgot his meals and his engagements and held his mind to the task so intently that at last the difficult combination was unlocked. We read that Leonardo da Vinci was accustomed to wait for days in deep reflection before beginning his paintings. This was especially so in the case of his masterpiece, "The Last Supper." It is said that for days he meditated before touching the canvas that he might catch such a vision of the face of Jesus Christ as would enable him more nearly adequately to represent His wonderful perfection. At last the vision came and the world is his debtor.

Not only should we have a regular place and time for meditation, but we should cultivate the habit of giving active attention to religious things at all times and in all places. John Wesley traced out some of his most helpful trains of thought while on his horseback journeys. One prominent Christian worker in this country has received some of his most powerful spiritual messages while pondering the Scriptures on railway trains and street cars. Wherever we are we should have this habit of mind; that is, of searching for the deeper spiritual meaning of facts and experiences, and of reminding ourselves of the presence of God. We should pay special attention to what occupies our minds in times of leisure. What engages a man's mind in his spare moments, the thoughts to which his mind freely returns, these declare the real man. We should become so accustomed to meditation on spiritual things that the mind when unoccupied with its regular work will revert unconsciously to the highest and best things.

Meditation must not be regarded as an end in itself. We should keep reminding ourselves of the objective of all spiritual meditation, namely, knowledge, faith, worship, character and service. We read that in heaven they not only "see His face," but also "serve Him." Never let meditation terminate in itself. To keep the objective before us the exercise of the will is necessary. As Ruysboek, the Belgian monk of the fourteenth century, said to the band of ecclesiastics who came to him to learn the secret of spiritual growth, "Ye are as holy as ye truly will to be holy."

A DESERT PLACE.

BY JOHN E. M'FADYEN.

Few sentences in the New Testament are more pathetic to me than this: "There were many coming and going, and the apostles of Jesus had no leisure so much as to eat." Jesus had sent them away to do their beneficent work upon the bodies and the minds of men. They had done it; and now they had come back and gathered about Him to tell Him of all that had befallen them. Jesus listened with an interest mingled with joy and pity. He knew that for the happy prosecution of the work of life men need not only enthusiasm, but strength. And so when their tale is told, He simply says, "Come by yourselves apart into a desert place, and take a little rest." And in words of simple pathos, the evangelist adds, "For crowds were coming and going, and they had not even a chance to eat." So, at the Master's bidding, they entered a boat and went away to a desert place apart.

This is indeed very touching; but the sequel is more touching still. For the kind wish of Jesus was defeated by the importunity of the crowd; and when they crossed to their desert place, where they had hoped to be by themselves apart, they found the place covered with a waiting throng that had hurried round the lake on foot. The work had to be begun again, and the repose seemed further off than ever. In the attitude of Jesus to this new and unexpected obligation, we get a glimpse into the depths of His great heart. An ordinary man would have resented the appearance of a crowd which so effectively dispelled all hope of repose and deprived Him and His of the rest they so sorely needed. But not so Jesus. "When He landed and saw the great crowds, He had pity upon them, and began to teach them many things." Those who had come to Him in such a way He could in no wise cast out. The seeming annoyance He accepted as a divine opportunity, and tired and disappointed as He and His disciples were, He gladly and uncomplainingly began again the great work which His Father had given Him to do.

It is worth pondering that Jesus deliberately sought for Himself and His disciples to escape from the crowd. It is also worth pondering that that escape proved impossible. In such a world as ours we are sometimes compelled by circumstances, or by regard for some high moral law, or for the sake of a needy brother, to act against our better knowledge. We know very well that we must spare ourselves, or our strength—and to that extent, our efficiency—will be impaired. Yet the circumstances of our life so arrange themselves that to spare ourselves is impossible; and so long as we have strength to stand upon our feet, we must go on with our work. These exacting demands, which seem at times so cruel, have no doubt their high compensations both here and hereafter; but while we must learn the stern obligation of service from the willingness of Jesus to do what He could for the crowd at the very time that He so yearned to be alone with His disciples, we have also to learn from His desire that they should go apart—and perhaps many of us need this lesson still more—how indispensable is rest and loneliness to all continued and effective work.

It is not without interest that the words for "come" and "rest" which Jesus used in His invitation to the disciples, are the same as those in which he gave to all that labored and were heavy laden that other invitation which has rung as an evangel throughout the centuries: "Come unto me and I will give you rest." Perhaps here, too, in the suggestion that they go to a desert place, there is a similar undertone. Not merely in the desert place will the inspiration be; for Jesus is to be there too. Nor is it only through going apart by themselves that they will renew their strength; for they are to go apart with Him. But all the same, the passage sounds an immortal warning to men who are consumed by zeal for the work to which they are giving their lives. The strongest and the most zealous need to go apart into a desert place and rest a while. They need it for their own sake; they need it for their work's sake. Much of the work has to be done "in the midst of the street"; and we can only possess our souls there in patience and peace if we have rested for a while apart in the desert place.

It was to satisfy two needs that Jesus urged upon His disciples this escape from the crowd—the need of aloofness and the need of rest. First, "Come by yourselves apart." The disciples had no doubt enjoyed some measure of success in their mission, and they may have been a little elated by their temporary popularity. At any rate, it was now time for them to go apart by themselves, away from the disturbing illusions of the crowd, to a desert place where they could view themselves and their work in truer perspective. A crowd is a terrible thing, and a good man may well fear it. He will fear its false standards of success. He will fear lest he come to measure his worth by the size of his crowd. He will fear lest he come to care more for their applause than to tell them the truth. Yes, the crowd is a menace to a man's true estimate of himself; and as he loves his soul, he will once in a while leave it all for the desert place where there is little to turn his head or distort his vision of the eternal things. Apart from men, and, above all, in the healthful presence of the primeval things, the sky, the mountains, the sea, we can look ourselves more honestly in the face, lift up our hearts to God, and give our panting lives a chance.

Again, besides going apart, Jesus bade His disciples take a little rest. The crowd has to be feared for its power to exhaust our strength and impair our real efficiency. This is the terrible penalty of popularity that it deprives its victim of the opportunity of sustaining his power upon its highest levels. Day by day his life is remorselessly eaten into. It is often just the way in which good people take their dissipation.

Most of the world's best work has been done by men who prepared for it in some desert place. Jesus began his own ministry with a season in the wilderness, and often afterwards He sought the loneliness of the mountain side. Paul had his Arabia, and John Bunyan his prison. The street has its place in the religious life, but so also has the desert. He will work best for the crowd who has rested in the wilderness. And not less needful than when first it was spoken is this healing word of Jesus to the crowded and distracted lives of men to-day: "Come by yourselves apart into a desert place and rest yourselves awhile."

JESUS' FRIEND.

BY MARK GUY PEARSE.

"Ye Are My Friends."

My friends. Now, if friendship means anything at all, it means fellowship—communion. I was very much shocked, very much startled, a little while ago, to find that the Lord Jesus Christ wrote seven letters and never sent His love. "Oh," I said, "here is an astonishing thing." Why, I do not think that there is a letter in the New Testament but there is some love sent, except in His letters. Here is a strange thing! He never sent His love and there were people dying for a message from the Lord Jesus Christ. Think of Mary. She would say: "Here is a letter from the Lord Jesus; has He sent a message?" "No." "Not to me?" "No." I have thought that perhaps the secretary left it out, because secretaries do leave things out, and then I remembered that the secretary was the Apostle John, the loving one, and he was never going to leave out the love. Then I read on and came to the postscript: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear My voice and open the door, I will come in and sup with him." Then I saw how it was. He never sends His love; He always brings it. You cannot send love. Love is one of those things that, when it flies, it flies away. It is one of those things that the post office cannot carry. Love is not a thing that can be written on a piece of paper. Love is the grasp of the hand and the gleam of the soul and the innermost heart that goes forth to greet you. "Ye are those that have opened the door to Me; ye are those that I have walked with and sat down with and communed with. Ye are My friends if ye love one another."

Now, this word "friends." It is a shame to render this word "friends." There are four words in the New Testament which are very different, but you get the meaning if you put the four together. First, the parable of the great supper. There is the man without the wedding garment, and the king says: "Friend. Here, you, sir, man, what are you doing here?" Just as we say, "Dear friends," when the collection is made, but it does not mean much. The next word is the word we use in England, where there is a dialect in every part of the country, where you say, not "You are coming to my house," but "You are coming to mine to-day"; "you are coming to ours to-day." That is as if everything were at your disposal, and this is the word He uses when He says (Mark 5: 9): "Go home to thy friends." Then the third word has the same meaning as love. It is a shame to render it "friend." "My lovers if you love one another."

I was waiting for a train a little while ago in England—people never wait for trains here I know—a man came to me and said: "You don't remember me?" I said, "Yes, I do, I remember you when you were a boy. When did I see you last?" "Don't you remember while you were preaching to 3,000 people you saw me and called me up on the platform?" "Well, what of that?" "Sir, you saw that I was low down and you said to me, 'Wherever you see me, whatever company I am in, come and shake hands with me, because I knew you when you were a boy.' That was the turning point of my life. I don't know what you preached about, but I said if you would shake hands with me like that there is some hope for me. That was nineteen years ago. I am a prosperous manufacturer now, and have a blessed wife and family." "You have forgotten the text," I said. "Yes." "And you don't remember the sermon?" "No." "That sermon that I had prepared so carefully!" Yes, but the grasp of the hand saved him. One little bit of love weighs down all oratory, or whatever you like to call it. In my mission I have been outside the churches for eighteen years. I try to get away from the rigid phraseology of the church.

I don't know whether you have ever thought what was the most beautiful thing about the Lord Jesus Christ. Of course, everything about Him was most beautiful, but yet the thing that amazes me more than anything else is that He always had leisure for friendship. That is a most amazing thing. He had no leisure to eat, but hours for friendship. I think we, most of all, want leisure to let people talk to us. Now, Jesus always had that, leisure to let people talk. I remember people have called on me and I have said: "I can give you exactly five minutes." Perhaps it was a woman and it took the poor body half an hour to remember what she did want. Jesus, the busiest man that ever lived, always had leisure to listen to people talk. Some people in London, and I suppose in New York, too, are like your houses. You have got to knock and ring before you can get in and then the master is not at home, or says he is not. How hard it is to get at some folks, is it not?

Some people seem to carry a notice posted upon them, "No admittance, except on business." They have no time for friendship; only for acquaintance. It is, "How do you do?" and away again. And some are like houses in the suburbs. They live such a long way off, when you get there the house is inclosed by a stone wall with grass growing on top. The porter comes and looks at you through a grating, opens the door reluctantly and says: "Beware of the dog," and then you walk a mile to the house and the folks are away. But Jesus, Jesus! He was like those cottages in the County of Cornwall where I was born. A thatched roof where the birds are always singing and the flowers blooming. There is a little wooden paling around the cottage with a gate without a bolt on it, only a latch, and that is generally broken. There is a little pathway to the front door, and in the doorway stands the blessed mother. Little children sit on the doorstep, singing in the sunshine. The mother comes to meet you before you get half way, saying: "Come in, come in, I am so glad to see you." That is Jesus. His heart has got no bell, no bolt, no bar. The door is always on the latch. When you come to see Him He is always at home—always at home. Before you get near to the door He comes forth with outstretched hands and says: "Come in, come in, I am so glad to see you." "Ye are my friends . . ." "These things I command you that ye love one another."—"Baptist Commonwealth."

REJECTED STONES.

(The Substance of an Address.)

What a picture that twenty-second verse of Psalm 118 conjures up! The words come in with an almost abrupt vividness which makes it allowable to imagine that their primary reference is to some episode in the building of the second temple, for whose service, probably, that thanksgiving hymn had been written. Do they refer to some bit of the older temple, cast aside as useless at first, and then put into a place of honor with added enthusiasm on account of its once despised age? If there be any such reference in the Psalm, the words will then have a double meaning, being descriptive of Israel's place among the nations after her long degradation, as well as of the suggested episode.

Naturally, however, we turn to their use in the New Testament to find that which gives them their deepest significance. Was there something in them which struck a peculiarly sensitive chord in Peter's mind, that we find this simile used both in an address by him to the Sanhedrin, and in one of the epistles which are attributed to him? We cannot tell, but we do know from incidents in his history, that Christ's teaching about rejected stones was a lesson which it took him some pains to learn, ending perhaps in the inner conflict that day on the roof of the tanner's house, when he understood, possibly for the first time with real clearness of conviction, that the cast out Gentiles must find entrance into the new kingdom. We can almost picture what the mental struggle must have been—the old landmarks, which had bounded the possibilities of his religious beliefs, were being swept away by the flood of new life, which was lifting so many to a level unknown before. If he were to follow the Master some barriers must be swept away, some far-lying beach be washed by the tide.

And we—as we try to go behind Peter to Peter's Master—have to ask ourselves, "What did Jesus mean by quoting this unwonted simile, so unwonted that we pause before we catch its significance?"

It is used, as will be remembered, with reference to the Pharisees, and directs our thoughts to what were, in fact, the crucial points of difference between them and Christ. We all know what the characteristics of the Pharisees were—to what extreme observances their formalism led them, till the people gave them nicknames after their self-righteous peculiarities—"bloody-forehead," of those who ran up against walls rather than open their eyes for fear of seeing a woman; "Shoulder-strong," of those walking bent, to show the weight of the Law which they carried, or "bandy-legged," when they trailed their feet on the ground. Yet it must not be forgotten that with all their absurd formalisms they stood for the organized religion of the land. They belonged to the religious party, and their plea was that religion could only be kept pure by a rigid casting out of everything likely to defile it. Thus they were always manufacturing stones of rejection, a temptation peculiarly strong in those who belong to any religious organization—in those who care about their church or chapel or meeting.

The contrast of Christ's method of creating a religious fellowship with that of the Pharisees may be summed up in two words—inclusion and exclusion. We note the difference when we see it writ large on the stage of history, when we trace the growing hostility of the religious party to One, who, they instinctively felt, struck at the root of their policy, when we follow Him outside the gates to the out-cast's death; but do we appreciate the many ways in which we still need the same teaching about the value of rejected stones?

It is not merely that our sympathies are not large enough; it is that we are actually blind to the meaning of Christ's teaching that there is absolute value in that which is cast away. The old stones are so obviously useless, that it is only to eyes made keen by knowledge or by love, that their value is apparent. It is only the Christ, who can "see white in Judas' heart." But the lesson is set before us under many forms. Commerce has over and over again shown the value of a refuse heap; science grows at the instigation of the misfitting instances, which will not come into line with others; art is ever urged forward by the revenges of her rejected canons; whilst theology might, if she would, profit by the fact, that the site of the temple, which excluded Gentiles with scornful notices, is trodden by a Mussulman lord. . . .

We get a little nearer to His mind on this point, if we think of the audience to which He spoke those wonderful parables of inclusion—the lost sheep, the lost piece of silver, and the lost son. The scene is a vivid one: the outcasts of society are drawing near to hear Him. The religious world is scandalized, and expresses its disapproval. To such a mixed audience He speaks of the impossibility of anything or any one falling outside the divine love. From the Fatherhood of God (implied in the last parable) He shows the limitless power of redemption, the drawing of all things into the divine unity. He carries us on, too, at the very point where art failed us, and for the sadness of her unfinished harmony, He gives us the joy over each ingathering, which pledges the completion of the whole.

It is well for us to ponder these things, for the best among us have not yet learned to care for all lost sheep, nor even to know how much we are lost sheep ourselves. We often inveigh against their folly, their obstinate wanderings, and are far from recognizing that in them is some factor of the great whole, which we, in our haste, have omitted. We forget that rejected stones are the materials for new temples, and that the factor, neglected in the old order, atones for that neglect by being chief in the new, even whilst we profess the belief that of that truth Christ was Himself the consummate expression.

It would be impossible here to suggest the many applications of this teaching: if we scrutinize our thoughts and our attitude of mind, we shall find that it is our habit to cast aside and reject, in many instances where we have hitherto only suspected ourselves of a just indignation: we have ruled people out of our fellowship because we disagree with them, because we think them dull or ignorant or wrong; we see nothing but the bad side of some people, and in consequence fail to attract them to the good common to us both. We shall not lack instances where there is need of the warning about rejection, if we begin to test our lives and thoughts by Christ's standard.

Before leaving the subject let us meet one palpable objection: this acceptance of everyone, this finding of good in everything, does it not lead to a weakening of our moral judgment, or loosening of our convictions, such as is so often deplored in the present day? To him who has allowed his natural and healthy craving for unity to become atrophied, such a result is undoubtedly possible; but the aimless, convictionless man is in a bad way already, and it will not be the largeness of his charity which is at fault, but the lack of any unifying power in his life. A useless drifter amongst shipwrecked persons, he cannot save others. But he, whose feet are on a rock, will prove that the firmer they are planted the further may he

Stretch out a loving hand
To wrestlers with the troubled sea.

It is not to the careless, but to the zealous, to those whose sense of the need for unity is strong, that there comes the temptation to make stones of rejection; and there are perhaps few within the bounds of religious organizations, who do not need to pray for a true appreciation of Christ's teaching, whilst they strive to learn the lesson taught to Peter, that "the stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner."—Joan Mary Fry, in the "British Friend."

AN ANCIENT MEETING HOUSE.

BY A FRIEND (BY DESCENT).

There may be some readers who might interest themselves in the following account of an ancient Friends' meeting house, which, after giving shelter to several generations of that Society, is now apparently approaching the end of its usefulness.

Chichester Meeting House is situated in a retired and wholly agricultural part of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, about three miles northwest of the ancient town of Marcus Hook, on the Delaware River, a few miles below Chester, which itself was a Swedish settlement some years before the first cave was dug for shelter by Penn's friends and companions on the site of the present city of Philadelphia. The present house was built on the site of an older one in the year 1769. It is divided by movable partitions in two equal parts for men and women respectively, and is of dimensions to seat perhaps about three hundred persons. It is substantially built of stone, as are the extensive horse sheds, and its demesne is enclosed by a heavy stone wall, with about four acres set off and separately enclosed in the same manner for a graveyard. The grounds slope down to a branch of Naaman's Creek, a tributary of the Delaware, called after a celebrated Delaware chief, who was a fast friend of the early white settlers from their first coming till his death about the year 1690. The small headstones which only are permitted by Friends' usage contain many names of the earliest Quaker companions of Penn, such as Duttons, Carpenters, Pennells, Elliotts, Claytons and other well-known names of early English Friends.

The meeting was, during many years, important in respect of membership, but at the separation in 1827 remained in possession of those who, though they have not given themselves any distinctive name, are commonly known as Hicksites. The buildings, though old, are in excellent condition, and the grounds are beautifully situated and contain some of the finest white oak trees now to be found in Pennsylvania. But the congregation—as the caretaker informed us—has now dwindled to but two individuals as regular attenders, both of them of the same family and quite elderly. It was once a large and important meeting, accommodating an extensive countryside exclusively settled by members and professors of the Society. Many are in the adjoining graveyard, and of their descendants, some have removed to other parts, and possibly still others may have joined other denominations of more modern customs. We were informed that certain periodical occasions still obtained a considerable attendance, notwithstanding the lamentable decline of the ordinary weekly meetings.

It was sad to see these venerable and attractive grounds and substantial buildings, which have accommodated so many generations of worshipers, and are still capable of use for centuries to come, reduced almost to solitude as far as numbers are concerned.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO HOLD RELIGIOUS CONFERENCES IN EASTERN YEARLY MEETINGS.

The Summer School of Religious History, held at Haverford in Sixth month last, was a time of marked blessing. It was felt that a measure of such blessing might be received by many, if Friends were encouraged to hold from time to time in connection with quarterly and yearly meetings religious conferences, in which instruction in subjects related to spiritual life might be combined with true devotion. A committee was accordingly appointed to encourage such work by promoting conferences of this nature in the yearly meetings east of the Alleghenies, by publishing a list of speakers who would be willing to take part in such conferences upon the payment of their traveling expenses, and to raise a fund to aid, when necessary, the service of these speakers. This committee is as follows: Isaac Sharpless, chairman; George A. Barton, secretary; Asa S. Wing, treasurer; Lindley D. Clark, Hannah Collins, Alfred C. Garrett, L. Lyndon Hobbs, Rufus M. Jones, Elbert Russell, Francis A. White, Julia S. White, Carolena M. Wood and Charles M. Woodman.

Temperance Department.

Issued Monthly, under the care of the

TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS, OF PHILADELPHIA
YEARLY MEETING.

All communications should be addressed to

ANNA EASTBURN WILLITS, Editor, 343 E. Main Street, Haddonfield, N. J.

The executive meeting of the Temperance Association was held at Friends' Institute, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on the 26th inst., with a large attendance. More than 10,000 pages of literature were distributed through the summer. Monthly meetings in Iowa and Oklahoma were supplied upon demand. Plans of aggressive temperance work were formulated for the winter.

"When Christ drank wine in Jerusalem it was during the Passover, when nothing leavened or fermented was in the houses of the children of Israel. Reliable Jewish authorities claim that the wine of the Passover, which Jesus drank, was the pure juice of the grape."

The providing of alcoholic beverages for the soldier has been thoroughly tried in Germany, and to-day it is recognized that if the army of that nation is to remain effective, the issue of brandy and beer rations must be abolished. Why repeat the experiment in this country at such a fearful cost of men and money?

The "Chicago Tribune" publishes the following: "The treating habit, as it prevails among men, is one of the nation's principal manufacturers of spend-thrifts and drunkards. The Anti-Treating League of America has been started by traveling men to abate the evil. It is a practical movement in favor not of total abstinence, but of real temperance." If it could be extended to total abstinence its power for good would be tremendous.

The Lacedæmonians, in order to disgust their sons with this vice, took a number of slaves, made them drunk, and took them to the public market place, where they acted foolishly and raved like madmen; some laughing, others fighting, hallooing, reeling to and fro, lying in the mud, grunting like pigs, etc. In this situation they exhibited them to their children, that, being disgusted with the effects of drunkenness, they might avoid every temptation to it.

Dr. Cadman, who has just returned from England, says that the drink habit there is very much more extensive than it is here, and that practically all the money made in Great Britain at present is made on brewery stock. Seven hundred clergymen and "many good deacons, too," to use his words, receive dividends from such stocks. The doctor adds, apologetically, however, that in the heavy, moist climate of the British Isles malted drink is not nearly so harmful as it is here.

Modern investigation has shown alcoholic drinks and other narcotics to be a chief cause of crime, poverty, misery, madness and the degeneracy that leads to anarchy. Thus the use of these substances is a menace to the individual and to the State. Ignorance of the laws of health, especially those which relate to the dangerous character and effects of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics, has led to their use. Therefore, to remove this cause, Congress and the Legislature of every State in the Union have enacted laws making the nature and effects of these substances in connection with physiology and hygiene a mandatory public school study.

At the State Biennial Convention of the Y. M. C. A., held in Trenton, N. J., three delegates were appointed a Committee on Resolutions. Among the resolutions reported and unanimously adopted was the following: "Realizing the increasing power and evil of the liquor traffic, which has been so often proved to be the source of three-fourths of the insanity, sickness, poverty and crime which so desolate our land, and these evils in nearly all instances dating from the first social glass, we will, therefore, as young men, with the help of God, leave no stone unturned and use every effort in our power to crush this dragon under foot until it is buried so deep that there shall be no shadow of hope for even its possible resurrection."

The extension of local option shows that the temperance question is one of increasing interest to the people. The widespread discussion of the "Subway Saloon" was but another evidence of the same truth. Within fifty years the temperance movement has radically changed its character. Then it was looked upon as almost entirely religious, and the aim was to secure signatures to total abstinence pledges. To-day it is largely treated in its social and local political aspects. The regulation of the traffic in intoxicants has become the outstanding feature of the movement. While the total amount of liquor consumed in this country has increased, yet the habit of social drinking has decreased, and the number of total abstainers appears to have grown larger.

Retail liquor dealers of Pennsylvania prepared to fight a local option bill which they heard that temperance interests intended introducing in the Legislature. The liquor men are concentrating their forces to bring pressure on the next Legislature of Pennsylvania to allow the saloons to open during certain hours on First-day, and to secure a material reduction on the present license fee of $1,100. In fact, they aim to have the fee cut in two. The liquor men claim about 12,000 persons identified with the saloon business directly in this State. Now, when we consider that this State has a population of about 7,000,000, it is self-evident that the liquor interest is in a decidedly insignificant minority. And yet, the astonishing fact remains, that the said minority wields a greater influence, politically, than all the Christian churches combined.

It is a curious fact that the prohibition movement in England was first organized through the refusal in 1840 of a life insurance company to accept a total abstainer at its ordinary advertised rates, says an English paper. The medical adviser of the company held that total abstention not only subjected its professor to unusual risks of infection, but also implied such a peculiar character, so different from that of the average man on which their statistics were based, that these could not be relied upon in determining the risk. This man was Robert Warner, a bell-founder, of London. He was twenty-six years of age, a total abstainer, and a Quaker. He immediately set about forming an insurance company of his own, and with the assistance of other total abstainers and members of the Society of Friends soon succeeded in establishing the United Kingdom Total Abstainers' Life Association, in which Warner took out the first policy.

Edward Bok, in regard to the "Patent Medicine Curse," says to the W. C. T. U., "and it may apply to all temperance people: 'Let me, therefore, summarize my ideas as to your present and most effective program of work: First. See to it that your members themselves cease the purchase and use of these injurious proprietary medicines except where specifically prescribed by a physician; as it is, numbers of them use them of their own accord. Employ individual effort, not printed material; place your members under obligation. Second. Have removed, wherever and howsoever possible, but always legally, not forcibly, the advertisements of these proprietary medicines from the properties of your members—whether by constitutional amendment, individual obligation or financial compensation from your own funds. Third. Enjoin each member, individually, to cease her subscription to her particular religious paper which, after remonstrance, persists in publishing the advertisements of these injurious proprietary medicines.'"

NEWS FROM THE WEST.

Stella Quarterly Meeting, Okla., is actively engaged in temperance work. Medal contests have been held, and twenty or more lectures delivered.

Haviland Quarterly Meeting, Kansas, is alive with timely talks and earnest pleas for temperance, and they have been heard with "hearing ears."

Since our last issue a report has been received from Iowa Monthly Meeting, held at Agra, Okla., which states: Number of meetings the past year on temperance, 19; lectures delivered, 9; temperance sermons preached, 10. Labor is extended to those members who use tobacco, and "they are realizing more the sinfulness of signing petitions for saloons or voting with political parties that endorse the license system."

THE GREATEST TEMPERANCE FORCE.

By all odds the greatest promoter of temperance in the last sixty years has been the change in business of every description which has especially marked that period. Everywhere the machine has superseded the man or the woman. This is as notable on the farm and in the farmer's home as in the town. In manufacturing, mining, engineering, transportation, and almost all other business pursuits, the individual worker has become a part of the machine, and the mechanism is too costly to be intrusted to the direction or manipulation of a man whose brain is liable to be befogged. In transportation, and, to a less extent, in mining and manufactures, not only the safety of property, but of life, depends upon the sobriety of employees. In the old days a wage-worker could go off on an occasional spree without interrupting the work of others; now the absence of a single employee may tie up the business or the branch of the factory in which he works.

This is, as we have said, the greatest of all influences tending to the promotion of temperance by and through the condemnation of intemperance in the use of intoxicants. It has wrought a great change in the past sixty years, and it remains a permanent, ever-present, and always operative power for good; for "the industrial world" will continue to have "no place for the man who gets drunk," and that is and will always be the strongest restraint upon appetite.

THE TEMPERANCE OUTLOOK.

In Vermont, the State which passed the first scientific temperance law, they have secured by popular vote—and it is needless to say that women do not vote in Vermont—a license system. But while little Vermont has proved so weak, great Texas, larger than twenty-eight Vermonts, and where the fiercest battles have been fought, has driven the traffic from county after county until nearly half of the counties are now wholly dry, and this, too, after an expenditure of a sum of money by the liquor forces which is without parallel in other campaigns. It is safe to say that three-fourths of the population of Texas is now under prohibition.

Mississippi has prohibition in sixty-five counties, and many towns in Tennessee have given large majorities for it. Minnesota forbids a man to give another a drink of liquor without a license, and requires all patent medicines to show the amount of alcohols they contain.

Kansas' prohibitory law, as shown by official statistics, saves the State six million dollars annually, forty-four out of one hundred and four counties being without a pauper, in three counties not a criminal case, and in twenty-five not enough poor to attempt the maintenance of a poorhouse. No wonder the voters declared by an overwhelming majority for the enforcement of the prohibitory law.

In other parts of the world the governments are taking up the temperance reform. In Austria last year the government issued 100,000 copies of a pamphlet entitled, "Away with Alcohol." In Paris, the director of the Poor Relief and the chief constable officially issued large posters with the heading in large letters, "The Dangers of Alcohol," followed by paragraphs setting forth the dangers of drink, and placarded the entire city with them. Imagine the effect if our strenuous President would so placard our capital city, and yet we give our thanks to Congress for passing a bill outlawing the sale of liquor in the capitol building, and also for a law forbidding the sale of intoxicants in the New Hebrides Islands, by American citizens, and making two appropriations of half a million dollars each for the erection of recreation buildings at military posts.

In Mexico the physicians unite in condemning the wave of alcoholism that has come with the American bar-room, and the government is anxious to stop the sale of liquor, and its action is almost universally approved by the people. In several other countries there is a decided awakening on the part of the authorities to the evils wrought by drink, and the International Temperance Congress held in Bremen has given a strong impetus to the reform.

New Zealand—note this—New Zealand, which John Woolley said was the nearest to prohibition of any in the world, where the people most nearly manage their own affairs, is the most abstemious country in the world, consuming less than one-twentieth of a gallon per capita annually. This one fact proves what has long been my contention, that the people do not want the liquor traffic, and that it is pushed on them by the politicians who reap advantage from it in various ways. The remedy is to bring about a system in which people will actually govern themselves, as they certainly do not now.

King Edward has placed the ban on wine drinking in the army, declaring that the practice must cease, and that his health can be drunk as well in water as in wine. In every army school in England and the colonies scientific temperance teaching has been compulsory since Fourth month, 1903. The results have been so satisfactory that the London School Board strongly urge local school committees to adopt the principle.

In Germany Count von Haeseler, one of the Emperor's military intimates, and an abstainer for twenty-five years, has issued a strong protest against the use of liquor by soldiers, declaring that the soldier who abstains is the best man and the best soldier. He also says that brandy is the worst poison of all, but that beer comes next to it in ill effects. A Berlin dispatch states that the Emperor has been having the experiment made at some posts of having no drinks save coffee and lemonade sold, and this without a protest from the rank and file, and that the issue of brandy and beer as part of the rations will be abolished throughout the Empire in the near future.

FOURTH QUARTER.

LESSON III.

TENTH MONTH 16, 1904.

ELISHA AND THE SHUNAMMITE.

2 Kings 4: 25-37.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Rom. 6: 23.

DAILY READINGS.

Second-day, Tenth mo. 10.—Kindness rewarded. 2 Kings 4: 8-17.
Third-day, Tenth mo. 11.—Sorrow in the home. 2 Kings 4: 18-24.
Fourth-day, Tenth mo. 12.—Elisha and the Shunammite. 2 Kings 4: 25-37.
Fifth-day, Tenth mo. 13.—The Shunammite. 2 Kings 8: 1-6.
Sixth-day, Tenth mo. 14.—The widow's son. Luke 7: 11-17.
Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 15.—The ruler's daughter. Luke 8: 41, 42, 49-56.
First-day, Tenth mo. 16.—Praise. Psa. 116: 1-13.

Time.—It is not possible to give exact dates regarding the incidents of Elisha's life. The accounts do not seem to be arranged in even chronological order. Elisha was a prophet for fully fifty years (850-798 B.C.), and lived in the kingdom of Israel.

Places.—Shunem, a small village, in the fertile plain of Esdraelon, about three miles north of Jezreel, seven miles south of Nazareth, and about twelve or fifteen miles from Mount Carmel. Elisha's headquarters seem to have been at Samaria. See 1 Sam. 28: 4; 1 Kings 1: 3.

Elisha appears to have been a good deal of an itinerant, and to have visited frequently the "schools of the prophets." There were very few inns or khans in those days, and travelers were compelled to resort to private houses. As this was the custom it was no unusual thing for travelers to ask for entertainment and to be cordially received. References to this custom are frequent in both the Old and New Testaments. It is not uncommon in some parts of our own country even at the present day.

The whole story of Elisha's association with the Shunammite should be read in connection with the lesson. (2 Kings 4: 8-37.)

25. "So she went." To seek help from the only one she felt could help her in her dire distress. "The man of God." Not an unusual name for a prophet. "To Mount Carmel." It would seem that Elisha frequently went there. It would take about five or six hours to go to Carmel. "Saw her afar off." He was on an elevation and recognized her. "Gehazi, his servant." Gehazi is mentioned only in this chapter, chapter 5 and chapter 8; from the latter (8: 4) he would appear to have been a person of some consequence, and may have stood towards Elisha as Elisha had stood towards Elijah. But he was a person of very different character from either.

26. "Run, I pray thee, now to meet her." Elisha saw at once that something unusual and of importance had happened. "Is it well with thee?" Literally, "Is it peace with thee?" This shows the sympathy of Elisha, for he might have waited and the Shunammite would have come to him, but he wished to show his sympathy at once. She answered, "It is well." Literally, "Peace." Her heart was too sorrowful and too full to speak to any one but the prophet himself, and the one word was ambiguous.

27. "Caught hold of his feet." An eastern fashion still observed by orientals. "Gehazi came near to thrust her away." Thinking, doubtless, she was importunate. Compare the action of the disciples of Christ on more than one occasion. "The Lord hath hid it from me." The prophetic and miraculous powers were not at the bidding of the prophet. The occasion of their use was chosen by the Lord.

28. "Did I desire a son?" See verses 12-17. She did not tell Elisha that the boy was dead, but her words and whole attitude revealed the fact to him in an unmistakable way. She practically said: "It would have been better not to have had a son than to have had one and lost him."

29. "He said to Gehazi," etc. It is not easy to understand the reason of this order. Possibly it may have been to make the mother feel that something was being done. "Salute him not." The Oriental salutations are so formal and so prolonged that they would take up much time. (Compare Luke 10: 4).

30. "I will not leave thee." She had no faith in any one or anything except the prophet himself. It was through his intercession that the son had come to her, and it was only through him that there was any hope of his restoration.

31. Gehazi did as he was bid, and evidently expected that some result would have followed his carrying out his master's commands. It is possible that it was because Elisha was ignorant of Gehazi's true character that nothing was allowed to take place. Had the child been revived, Gehazi, an unworthy instrument, might have claimed a share in the miracle.

32. When Elisha reached the house there was no doubt of the fact.

33. Elisha recognized that the matter called for special intercession. "Shut the door." There were to be no witnesses of the child's restoration, no show made. The room was the prophet's own chamber. (See verse 21.) "Prayed unto the Lord." (Compare the action of Elijah at Zarephath.) (1 Kings 18: 17-23.) Note that prayer preceded action.

34. It is altogether likely that Elisha was familiar with the incident of Zarephath, and followed Elijah's example. Why the restoration should not come as rapidly in the one case as in the other cannot be known, and it is idle to speculate. "The flesh of the child waxed warm." The recovery was slow. "Sneezed seven times." Sneezing was a definite sign of returning animation. Seven is a perfect number, and is also used to express many times.

36. "Take up thy son." (Compare 1 Kings 17: 23; Luke 7: 15.)

37. "Fell at his feet." To show the depth of her gratitude. She returns thanks and shows her deep appreciation even before she takes up her son.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Association with saints is not enough; the heart must be changed. Who could have had better opportunities than Gehazi and Judas?

2. Nothing can take the place of personal sympathy.

3. "The prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

TOPIC FOR TENTH MONTH SIXTEENTH.

THE POWER OF PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

John 1: 35-39.

Second-day, Tenth mo. 10.—Hannah's influence. 1 Sam. 1: 21-28.

Third-day, Tenth mo. 11.—Daniel's influence. Dan. 2: 46-49.

Fourth-day, Tenth mo. 12.—Nehemiah's influence. Neh. 5: 8-13.

Fifth-day, Tenth mo. 13.—Esther's influence. Esther 5: 1-3.

Sixth-day, Tenth mo. 14.—Stephen's influence. Acts 22: 19, 20.

Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 15.—The town clerk's influence. Acts 19: 35-41.

The best influence is rather a by-product than a direct achievement. While it ought never to be forgotten and may be rightly cultivated, its surest foundation is in an established character which has its springs and purposes not so much in the thought of how it will affect others as in how it measures up to the sight of God.

Some men set about acquiring influence for its own sake, or that by it they may gain some personal ends. Their method is to acquire in some way the power to injure enemies and to reward friends so that they may control their actions by either hope or fear. But we are sure that the Christian's influence is to be something very different from that, since our Pattern's purpose was not to serve Himself, but to help others.

The beginnings of influence may be so small as to be almost unnoticed, but if one waits until the great trial before he takes his stand, his influence will go but a little way. It is the man with a record that people look to, and this record is mostly a summing up of little things. We all fancy that we would be heroic in the glare of some great occasion, but the fiber that bears the stress has hardened through long years.

"If Stephen had not prayed the church would have had no Paul," said St. Augustine. But if Stephen had not had the habit of trustful prayer, how could he have made that intercession for his murderer?

ers? These words doubtless lived in Paul's mind day and night until the "heavenly vision" showed him the martyr's last petition answered. If Stephen, indeed, gave Paul to the Church, how priceless has his influence been, and how boundless through all coming time!

"Daniel purposed in his heart." If he had waited to see what the others chose or to sound his princely guardian, we would probably know nothing of Daniel, and God would have lacked this messenger to the kings of Babylon. His purpose not only held him steadfast, but served to support his three friends as well, while we still sing "Dare to be a Daniel."

The Ephesian town clerk had influence because he could justly do what he so wisely did—array himself on the side of law and hint at the power of Rome with which he was in some measure allied. But if he had been known as making exceptions and appealing to courts only when it agreed with his private purpose, such an appeal as he then made would have been in vain.

When Garfield quieted the raging mob in New York City after Lincoln's assassination, by reminding the excited men that "God still lives," his influence was that of a man known for his sincerity and patriotism, who was able to array himself on the side of a mightier power than that of Rome, and lift men's thoughts to the great Judge and Ruler of all.

In the summing up, right is might.

HORSES, HARNESS AND WAGON WANTED.

Hector River, Jamaica, W. I.,

Eighth month 19th, 1904.

Dear Friends: During my short stay in America I visited a number of country districts, and was very much impressed with the benefits of the rural accommodations, some of which did not exist when I left America, eleven years ago.

The advantage of the telephone to get up an unannounced meeting was something almost marvelous to one unaccustomed to doing things on short notice. The rural mail, too, is such a convenience. But the one thing that impressed me most was the kindergarten delivery wagon. It is just what we have needed for eight years. There are always so many matters to bring before our board that require money, that we often hesitate to make our wants known and put before them only the most urgent requests for the extension of the work. Perhaps we have not honored God as we should. The wealth of the world is His, and if our actual needs are known His answer awaits us in some of His storehouses.

The East Indians are scattered over many plantations widely separated. If we had horses, harness and wagon we could have at least twenty more Indian children in our day school, and through the children reach many a heathen parent in the localities where they get very little teaching.

Rufus King, our first East Indian convert, could be well trusted to pick up the little ones daily, and in his quiet, sweet Christian spirit give many a message as he journeyed.

May the dear Lord lay this burden upon some one who can thus help us to carry the gospel quicker to the heathen. Some of our school children of a few years ago are now lights in India. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me."

Sincerely your fellow worker in the spread of the gospel,
H. ALMA SWIFT.

A PEACE MEETING IN JAPAN.

At the time of the visit of William Jones to Japan in 1889 the Japan Peace Society was organized. As secretary of the London Peace Society, as well as a member of that religious body which has always borne its testimony against all war, he succeeded wherever he went in rallying the friends of peace and arbitration. Notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of the peace cause in Japan, a constitution was adopted, public meetings were held and a periodical published in Japanese for some time. The society was at one time discontinued, only to be again put upon its feet by the earnest efforts of George Braithwaite. At the time of the Chino-Japan war it was adjourned without naming the day for re-assembling. Ten years have now gone by without re-opening the work. In the mean time little has been done except by private and incidental efforts to interpret the peace principles of the gospel, unless one makes mention of the socialistic teaching of Tolstoi, which has won some followers in Japan. At the breaking out of the present war, the Salvation Army workers published one of General Booth's articles against war, and some of their Christian workers at public street meetings preached on the subject of peace.

Notwithstanding the almost universal prevalence of the war spirit in Japan, there are a few individuals here and there in different religious organizations, and some belonging to no organization, who have been sorely grieved that so little is being done to rally the friends of peace and carry on an educational movement along this line.

A hopeful movement looking toward a more aggressive work was the addition of the Department of Peace and Arbitration to the Foreign Auxiliary of the W. C. T. U. of Japan at the time of the annual gathering of missionaries in Kaniyawa for their summer rest and fellowship conferences. There was no opposition to this, but rather an eagerness on the part of the membership to learn more about the great movements toward peace and arbitration.

The new superintendent of the department is Lettice E. Braithwaite, an English Friend, wife of George Braithwaite, of the Japan Tract Society. She is entering into the work with much earnestness. The first public meeting was held a few days after the new department was organized. Though the attendance was not large, the meeting was much appreciated by those present. A Methodist missionary, himself one of the very few warm advocates of peace in the missionary body, remarked that this meeting was the opening for regular annual meetings among the missionaries on the subject of peace and arbitration. The following program was rendered:

"Explanation of the Work of the Department of Peace and Arbitration," George Braithwaite.

"Why Christians Should Desire That Peace Take the Place of War," Joseph Cosand.

"Platform of the Mohonk Conference," Dr. A. D. Hail, Cumberland Presbyterian Mission.

"Relation of the Christian Endeavor Movement to Peace and Arbitration," Dr. J. H. Pettee, A.B.C., F.M.

"Forces Making for the World's Peace," Gilbert Bowles.

Joseph Cosand emphasized the beauty of peace, the horrors of war, and the economy and justice of settling differences by arbitration.

Dr. Hail, one of the most influential missionaries in Japan, himself an old soldier in the Union Army in the Civil War, is one of the six missionaries to whom the Japanese officials have granted permission to go to the front for work among soldiers. He spoke hopefully of the Mohonk Conference, and emphasized the need of an educational campaign for arbitration.

Dr. Pettee, leader of the Christian Endeavor movement in Japan, gave a sketch of the aggressive work which the Christian Endeavor is doing for international brotherhood and arbitration. Each Christian should ask himself whether he is doing all within his power for the peace of the world.

Under the last subject attention was called to the forces making for peace, as indicated by the cry of the laboring man, the demand of business organizations, the heart of the world's women, the spread of the gospel, a truer interpretation of the spirit and history of Christianity, peace and arbitration societies, and the development of international law.

Notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of an educational peace movement in Japan there is a growing conviction in the hearts of a small number of Christians that the work can no longer be delayed. The above meeting has done much to give point, purpose and courage to this group of workers. It is but the beginning. Let all hearts which are burdened by the present war and all workers for the world's peace remember this movement in frequent prayer.

CHRISTIANS IN THE JAPANESE ARMY.

[The following is taken from "The Christian Movement in Its Relation to the New Life in Japan," a pamphlet which is issued by a committee of co-operating Christian missions.—Ed.]

There is reason to believe that the number of Christians among the officers of the army and navy of Japan, while not great, is still out of proportion to the number in the nation at large. Rear-Admiral Uryu, who won the first battle of the war, is a graduate of the United States Military Academy at Annapolis, of the class of 1881. He is a member of a Presbyterian church in Tokyo, and was for some time an elder. He was a classmate at Annapolis of the late Rear-Admiral Serata, who was not less noteworthy as a Christian than as an officer.

The letters of the Christian officers to their pastors and others are likely to constitute a literature of much interest and value. Already there is evidence that their faith is proving a bond of union between them and the Korean Christians. By a happy coincidence a Japanese captain, member of a Methodist church in Sendai, found himself quartered on premises belonging to the American Methodist missionaries in Pyong Yang in Korea, much to the satisfaction of both parties. A young lieutenant of engineers recently wrote back to the Kumi-ai (Congregational) Church to which he belonged, of the sense of brotherhood awakened in him as he marched through the Korean town one Sunday morning and saw the Christians assembled in church with their Testaments and hymn-books. It is worth while to record these things, for this body of faithful men, small though it is, exerts a most healthful influence upon the public sentiment of the army. While all may not agree in this estimate of the influence of the Christian element in the army and navy, few will fail to admit that seldom was an army gathered which was under better restraint, or which on the whole represented a nobler ethical purpose.

Correspondence.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Dear Friend: I see according to the published reports of one of our late yearly meetings that the question arose as to the attitude that ministers in the Friends' Church should maintain toward those services held in connection with Decoration Day. So far as appeared by the report (with one or two notable exceptions), the drift of the sentiment was in favor of co-operation, even to the extent of opening our meeting houses and preaching the sermons when requested to do so.

It was said that it afforded a favorable opportunity to preach the gospel of peace to the old soldiers, that our ministers were not required to insult a whole community by refusing to comply, that we do not believe in water baptism, but that it would not therefore be proper to close our meeting houses against persons simply because they had been baptized, etc.

Now if we could only lay aside our prejudices, and divorce our minds from the effects of false teachings brought down to us through the ages respecting patriotism and protection and military heroism; if we will brush aside the veil and look upon what it really is, we will most certainly discover that in the light of our civilization war is the most diabolical sin and crime of the world to-day; that it is nothing short of organized murder, and on a most stupendous scale, and the military spirit everywhere is making the most of all opportunities to continue its terrible burdens upon mankind, and these decoration services, while they are nice and considerate from a military point of view, they all count on the side of war. We should not expect that any society, organization or institution will employ ministers or speakers whom they think will in the least damage their cause. They get the minister because they expect to be made stronger, not weaker, and the minister who would accept will be out of place and impolitic if he does not aim to endeavor to fill this known prospect, and this the Quaker minister cannot consistently do. To me it appears plain that the whole matter turns on what we wish to promote by such a course. If we want to surrender our testimony against war, then that is one of the very nice and easy ways to accomplish that end. We are at least on that road. But if that testimony, which is the most prominent distinguishing one in our church, and is of itself quite sufficient to justify our continued existence; if that testimony is dear to us, there should be no need whatever of insulting anybody by respectfully declining to violate it. And there certainly cannot be thought to be even a remote comparison between the importance of our testimony against war and our belief about water baptism—one as innocent in itself as it would be to take a basin of water and wash the face and hands, while the other means man's brutal and barbarian nature aroused to the highest pitch, and his faculties set vigorously to work to learn how to use in an effective way the most deadly weapons, and also to contrive the most dangerous schemes for deceiving, ensnaring, entrapping and destroying, and then these let loose for mutual havoc and destruction. The work of Decoration Day is specific. It is the soldier's grave that is decorated; the grave near by of the most noted apostle of peace would not be noticed, and from a war standpoint this is right, for the purpose of these services is to commend and extol the deeds of war and the warrior, and I believe all well-informed people, even outside of the church, would think consistency would require that we refrain from participating in them, for we set forth in our fundamental law that all war is utterly incompatible with the plain precepts of our divine Lord and law-giver.

The world greatly needs at this time the benefits which will arise from consistently and faithfully upholding this doctrine. We should highly prize the high and firm stand always taken by our church on this most tenable ground, and shun even an appearance of encouraging war.

Rockville, Ind., Ninth month 25th, 1904.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves.

Haverford College has opened with the largest roll of students in its history.

Richard H. Thomas has been successfully moved back from the mountains to his city home in Baltimore.

Seneca H. Stevens has returned to Moore's Mills, N. Y., after extended service in New England, following their yearly meeting.

Friends School, at Providence, R. I., under its new name, The Moses Brown School, has opened with an enrollment of 162 pupils.

Sarah Dakin, an esteemed Friend and Christian worker, recently "entered into rest" at Ferrisburg, Vt. She will be greatly missed from that meeting.

I. Emory Pearson, a minister from Lawrence, Kansas, attended Friends' Monthly Meeting at Knightstown, Ind., the 24th ult. His services were acceptable.

A letter from Gilbert Bowles at Tokyo, says: "All of the Friends' missionaries in Japan are well, and are looking forward with much hope to the year's work now ready to open."

Elizabeth G. Underhill entered upon pastoral duties at Cornwall, N. Y., the 2d inst. She hopes soon to reopen the Bible School at "The Landing." With two meetings and two Bible Schools she will find blessed service.

The annual meeting of the Corporation of Haverford College will be held in the Committee Room of Arch Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, on Third-day, Tenth month 11th, 1904, at 3 o'clock p.m. Members are particularly requested to bear this appointment in mind.

The Evangelistic Committee of New York Yearly Meeting will shortly issue a list of "Church Extension Lectures," to be given by volunteers. The list embraces a wide range of topics, and will enable committees to select speakers for quarterly meeting conferences, etc.

Lindley M. Stevens and Elizabeth C. F. Stevens will take up work in "The Training School for Christian Workers" in Cleveland, Ohio. He is clerk of the meeting on ministry and oversight of New York Yearly Meeting, and she is an active member of the Evangelistic and Church Extension Committee.

They will be greatly missed, but cannot fail of being of great service in their new field. Lindley M. Stevens will occupy the position of superintendent, a position similar to the one which he formerly filled at Oakwood Seminary.

J. B. Mitchell, McClure, Ohio, who is doing a good work among the mountaineers of North Carolina and Kentucky, is asking for help. First of all, he wants a large supply of Bibles and New Testaments. Also gospel and children's books, song books, Sabbath School literature, school books, such as spellers and first readers for the primary department; tracts, Sabbath School cards and papers which are filled with gospel reading and clothing for the poor children especially. Our friend has been in the work more than five years. In that time he has received 61,122 Bibles and Testaments, 573,000 tracts, and over fifty tons of gospel papers and Sabbath School supplies. His work is in a very needy and fruitful field, and he deserves our help.

The following is the program for the sixty-sixth anniversary of the organization of Friends' Meeting at Salem, Iowa, to be held at Friends' Meeting House, Tenth month 8th:

Sixth-day evening, the 7th, at 7.30, praise service, led by Esther Ellen Frame. Henry E. Skinner in charge of the music.

LEVELERS.

The Mission of Whiskey, Tobacco and Coffee.

The following article has been widely published, and is one of the most remarkable illustrations of the value of careful marshalling and analysis of facts in presenting a subject to the public:

The Creator made all things, we believe.

If so, He must have made these.

We know what He made food and water for, and air and sunshine, but why Whiskey, Tobacco and Coffee?

They are here sure enough, and each performing its work.

There must be some great plan behind it all; the thoughtful man seeks to understand something of that plan and thereby to judge these articles for their true worth.

Let us not say "bad" or "good" without taking testimony.

There are times and conditions when it certainly seems to the casual observer that these stimulant narcotics are real blessings.

Right there is the ambush that conceals a "killing" enemy.

One can slip into the habit of either whiskey, tobacco or coffee easy enough, but to "untangle" is often a fearful struggle.

It seems plain that there are circumstances when the narcotic effect of these poisons is for the moment beneficial, but the fearful argument against them is that seldom ever does one find a steady user of either whiskey, coffee or tobacco free from disease of some kind.

Certainly powerful elements in their effect on the human race.

It is a matter of daily history testified to by literally millions of people, that Whiskey, Tobacco and Coffee are smiling, promising, beguiling friends on the start, but always false as hell itself in the end. Once they get firm hold enough to show their strength, they insist upon governing and drive the victim steadily towards ill-health in some form; if permitted to continue to rule, they will not let up until physical and mental ruin sets in.

A man under that spell (and "under the spell" is correct), of any one of these drugs, frequently assures himself and his friends, "Why I can leave off any time I want to. I did quit for a week just to show I could." It is a sure mark of the slave when one gets to that stage. He wiggled through a week fighting every day to break the spell, was finally whipped, and began his slavery all over again.

The slave (Coffee slave as well as Tobacco and Whiskey) daily reviews his condition, sees perfectly plain the steady encroachments of disease, how the nerves get weaker day by day, and demand the drug that seems to smile and offer relief for a few minutes, and then leave the diseased condition plainer to view than ever and growing worse. Many times the Coffee slave realizes that he is between two fires. He feels bad if he leaves off and a little worse if he drinks and allows the effect to wear off.

So it goes on from day to day. Every night the struggling victim promises himself that he will break the habit, and next day when he feels a little bad (as he is quite sure to) breaks, not the habit, but his own resolution. It is nearly always a tough fight, with disaster ahead sure if the habit wins.

There have been hundreds of thousands of people driven to their graves through disease brought on by coffee drinking alone, and it is quite certain that more human misery is caused by coffee and tobacco than by whiskey, for the two first are more widely used, and more hidden and insidious in the effect on nerves, heart and other vital organs, and are thus unsuspected until much of the dangerous work is done.

Now, reader, what is your opinion as to the real use the Creator has for these things? Take a look at the question from this point of view.

There is a law of Nature and of Nature's God that things slowly evolve from lower planes to higher, a sturdy, steady and dignified advance toward more perfect things in both the physical and spiritual world. The ponderous tread of evolutionary development is fixed by the Infinite, and will not be quickened out by natural law by any of man's methods.

Therefore we see many illustrations showing how nature checks too rapid advance. Illinois raises phenomenal crops of corn for two or three years. If she continued to do so every year her farmers would advance in wealth far beyond those of other sections or countries. So Nature interposes a bar every three or four years, and brings on a "bad year."

Here we see the leveling influence at work.

A man is prosperous in his business for a number of years and grows rich. Then Nature sets the "leveling influence" at work on him. Some of his investments lose, he becomes luxurious and lazy. Perhaps it is whiskey, tobacco, coffee, women, gambling, or some other form. The intent and purpose is to level him. Keep him from evolving too far ahead of the masses.

A nation becomes prosperous and great like ancient Rome. If no leveling influence set in she would dominate the world perhaps for all time. But Dame Nature sets her army of "levelers" at work. Luxury, over-eating and drinking, licentiousness, waste and extravagance, indulgences of all kinds, then comes the wreck. Sure, Sure, Sure.

The law of the unit is the law of the mass. Man goes through the same process. Weakness (in childhood), gradual growth of strength, energy, thrift, probity, prosperity, wealth, comfort, ease, relaxation, self-indulgence, luxury, idleness, waste, debauchery, disease, and the wreck follows. The "levelers" are in the bushes along the pathway of every successful man and woman, and they bag the majority.

Only now and then can a man stand out against these "levelers," and hold his fortune, fame and health to the end.

So the Creator has use for Whiskey, Tobacco and Coffee to level down the successful ones and those who show signs of being successful, and keep them back in the race, so that the great "field" (the masses) may not be left too far behind.

And yet we must admit that same all-wise Creator has placed it in the power of man to stand upright, clothed in the armor of a clean cut steady mind and say unto himself, "I decline to exchange my birthright for a mess of pottage."

"I will not deaden my senses, weaken my grip on affairs and keep myself cheap, common and behind in fortune and fame by drugging with whiskey, tobacco or coffee, life is too short. It is hard enough to win the good things, without any sort of handicap, so a man is certainly a 'fool trader' when he trades strength, health, money and the good things that come with power, for the half-asleep condition of the 'drugger' with the certainty of sickness and disease ahead."

It is a matter each individual must decide for himself. He can be a leader and semi-god if he will, or he can go along through life a drugged clown, a cheap "hewer of wood or carrier of water."

Certain it is that while the Great Father of us all does not seem to "mind" if some of his children are foolish and stupid, he seems to select others (perhaps those he intends for some special work), and allows them to be threshed and castigated most fearfully by these "levelers."

If a man tries flirting with these levelers awhile, and gets a few slaps as a hint, he had better take the hint or a good solid blow will follow.

When a man tries to live upright, clean, thrifty, sober and undrugged, manifesting as near as he knows what the Creator intends he should, happiness, health and peace seem to come to him. Does it pay?

This article was written to set people thinking, to rouse the "God within," for every highly organized man and woman has times when they feel a something coming from within for them to press to the front and "be about the Father's business," don't mistake it; the spark of the Infinite is there, and it pays in every way, health, happiness, peace and even worldly prosperity, to break off the habits and strip clean for the work cut out for us.

It has been the business of the writer to provide a practical and easy way for people to break away from the coffee habit, and be assured of a return to health and all of the good things that brings, provided the abuse has not gone too far, and even then the cases where the body has been rebuilt on a basis of strength and health run into the thousands.

It is an easy and comfortable step to stop coffee instantly by having well-made Postum Food Coffee served rich and hot with good cream, for the color and flavor is there, but none of the caffeine or other nerve destroying elements of ordinary coffee.

On the contrary, the most powerful rebuilding elements furnished by Nature are in Postum, and they quickly set about repairing the damage. Seldom is it more than two days after the change is made before the old stomach or bowel troubles or complaints of kidneys, heart, head or nerves show unmistakable evidence of getting better, and ten days' time changes things wonderfully.

Literally millions of brain-working Americans to-day use Postum, having found the value and common sense in the change.

C. W. POST.

There is no critic of the President's warlike tendencies who will not extend to him congratulations for having favorably responded to the request of the delegates of the Interparliamentary Union that he invite the various nations signatory to The Hague Convention to a second conference on international arbitration and kindred questions. It is to be hoped that if the question of the curtailment of national armaments, especially great navies, comes up in the conference the American delegates will be instructed to throw their influence in favor of a curtailment scheme.

HARD SENSE.

Something wise was said the other day by the famous labor-leader, John Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America. He was addressing the Illinois convention of miners, and used the following expressions, which deserve to be printed in letters of gold.

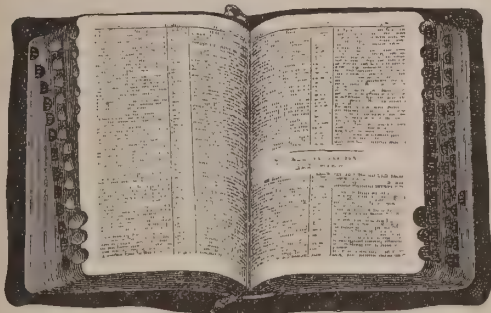

I remember the time when I regarded my employer as my natural enemy. I thought it was my business to fight him continually. And I felt it was the sphere of unions to antagonize the bosses at every point.

A fight is sometimes necessary, I still recognize, but the best interests of both parties are best served, I now appreciate, by establishing harmonious relations be-

"THE LORD THY GOD IS ONE GOD."

One of the most serious errors which creeps into the doctrinal views of many Christians comes from assuming that God is one Being, and that Christ is a different divine Being whose sufferings affect God, the first Being. Whether we say that Christ of His own accord came to undergo certain sufferings in order to satisfy God, or that God sent Him to undergo these sufferings for that end, we make God and Christ two distinct Beings. Such views destroy the unity of God and lead to polytheism, i. e., to plural Gods.

Christianity has again and again fallen into this danger and many Christians to-day, however little they mean it, talk as though they believed in and worshiped two or even three Deities. We may consider it settled that any view of the atonement or of redemption which assumes God and Christ as separate, independent Beings is an erroneous or imperfect view, and needs correction.

It is a foundation truth of Christianity that God and Christ are one, in a much more genuine way than the fountain and the river are one, or the sun and the sunlight are one, or the tree and its leaves are one. All figures of speech are here inadequate and more or less misleading. But if we are to reach any consistent conception of the divine redemption of man, the sinner, we must hold fast to the complete oneness of God and Christ. Whatever Christ does for man's redemption God does. On any other course of thought we shall sooner or later shipwreck and break our theology to pieces.

How can we think of God and Christ as one? It is difficult to do it, i. e., actually to think it. All metaphors fall short. Human love gives us a clue, though it does not take us very far. The mother and the child she loves are so one that if the child suffers she suffers, and if the child dies part of her real self goes. But however one they are, yet for matters of moral responsibility they forever remain two. Love helps us to bridge the chasm, but it does not quite bridge it. It may help us further if we consider the analogy of our own lives as persons. Every one of us has an inner, invisible self. What he really is—his true being—is beyond the reach of eye, the touch of hand, beyond the range of sounds. His hidden being is inaccessible to any mortal. We say, "I see John," but we do not mean that we see that real thing which constitutes him the person he is.

But each one of us also expresses himself in a visible way, as a person of such height and complexion, with these special eyes and lips and hands, which reveal us to others. Now this does not make two persons. The hidden inner self and the self which is expressed through a body are not two different selves. In so far as we learn to know a person through his visible manifestations of himself, we know the real person who would be inaccessible to us but for the manifestations.

Christ is God expressed or manifested. He is God incarnated or made man. He is the human expression of God. The invisible God, inaccessible to senses like ours, is not a different God, not another, but the same. Christ is God actively showing Himself and taking up the human problem, the difficulty of sin. He is no double being—half man and half God, human in some points, divine in others—He is completely God, He is completely man, for He is God humanly revealed. A true view of the atonement must start out of this truth of the unity of God.

RICHARD H. THOMAS.

After weeks of hovering between life and death, suddenly at last our dear friend Richard H. Thomas departed this life on the evening of the 3d instant. All of us who have been receiving news from his bedside have expected such an issue sooner or later, but yet the actual, unescapable fact comes as a shock and makes us awake to our loss in a much more real sense than we could feel it while there flickered some slight hope.

The fittest word for him is, "well done, good and faithful servant." The first impression is that of a man who did his day's work with a more than ordinary devotion and consecration, and who was unusually sensitive to the Divine voice and gladly obedient when it came.

His was one of those fine lives which carry about a sanctifying influence, an atmosphere to be felt rather than described, a spiritual aroma that counts almost more than spoken words. It was perfectly evident to all who knew him that he partook of Christ, whether he said he was a "follower" or not. His Christianity shone plainly out of him.

One notable feature in him was his simple honesty. He was always extremely afraid of appearing to hold any view which he had not verified in his own life and tested in actual experience and which did not seem to him true to the eternal nature of things. This often caused him to be misunderstood. Where others were bold in their certainty, he waited until he could speak what he knew and testify to what he had seen. He was deeply rooted in the principles and conceptions of early Quakerism, and he could not adjust to the changes which were thick about him. The result was that he did not exercise the influence in America which his gifts and talents qualified him to take. He was a persuasive writer, a gifted speaker, but he was at his best only with congenial spirits, not in winning over those who were traveling different paths from his own, and it is true that he has not shaped the course of thought in this country in large degree, though there are many here who have been helped and blessed through him. In England he has exerted a very marked influence. Many look to him as to a spiritual father, very many young Friends on that side the water first found the light through his message and through fellowship with him. He was planning a definite service in Great Britain when his physical health broke down last spring. In his own home meeting he has for years been a leading minister and a great spiritual influence. How his place can be filled no one can yet imagine, but the Lord who gave this man his gifts and graces is Lord also of the harvest field, and the work will go on.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

A REPORT of the Peace Conference in Boston is promised by one of the delegates, but it has not arrived in time for this issue. We print an important passage from the "Appeal to the Nations," which was adopted at the conclusion of the Conference:

"The congress at the conclusion of its deliberations appeals to the peoples of all nations and of all classes to arouse themselves to a finer and more adequate conception of their rights in the determination of the foreign policies pursued by their governments, that they may no longer be involved without their consent in foolish and ruinous wars with other powers. It respectfully invites the national sovereigns and presidents, all ministers of religion, all instructors of youth in schools of every grade and all others who wield influence in the moulding and directing of public opinion to throw the entire weight not only of their personal influence, but of their positions, toward eradicating the causes of misunderstanding and conflict and the creation of such a complete system of international adjudication and such a wide reaching pacific public sentiment as will in time render the barbarous method of war impossible."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

THE NOURISHMENT OF THE PSALMS.

BY ROBERT E. SPEER.

In the summer of 1887 I attended the conference for Christian workers at Northfield with a friend who had recently left Princeton Theological Seminary and was soon to go out to India as a missionary. We traveled together to Northfield. We lived together for the three weeks of the conference and together we came away at its close. It was my first intimate and prolonged experience with such a real man of God, and it was an experience of priceless value and inspiration. The conference was a great blessing. Professor Drummond was there, and Major Whittle and Dr. Gordon and Dr. William Henry Greene. But no influence was more blessed and powerful than that of my friend. It was all unconscious on his part. It flowed from the sincerity, the integrity, the vital strength of his own spiritual life and character. I remember many of his ways, but none more distinctly than his morning and evening reading of the Psalms.

Experience will have taught all who have tried it the value of this practice in the Christian life. Such practices with many are most valuable when they are alternated with others, but again and again, we need to bring our lives back to the fountain from which pours forth the best longing and desire, the purest confession, the richest emotions, the most vital religious convictions of Israel.

One advantage of the Psalms for us is their detachableness. They are not a book as Romans is a book, needing to be mastered as a whole before the parts are fully known. The Psalms are brief and separable. A single cry or exclamation may be the whole and completed utterances of some man's soul, centuries ago, yet as truly may be the whole call of some soul to-day. No busy cares, no absorption in work or duty can prevent the Psalms from finding us, and finding us in the very needs of our modern lives.

There are some beautiful illustrations of this in Morley's "Life of Gladstone." The Psalms again and again furnished the great statesman with the guidance or consolation or heartening of soul of which in some great crisis he stood in need, and probably every Christian has had experiences like Gladstone's. Some could even write the story of their inner lives as they have moved from one stage to another of defeat or victory in expressions from the Psalms which embody great typical experiences, universal and enduring, familiar to men of all lands and all times because their hearts are as the hearts of Israel.

Doubtless, one hindrance to a fresh and fruitful use of the Psalms is the fact that they are grown mechanical to us. The phrases have become familiar and no longer puncture with vital suggestion the hardened familiarity of our thought and feeling. It is on this account that those who cannot read the Psalms in Hebrew, but can in German or French or Spanish do well to use such a translation, and by those who can do neither, the same end can be secured by using some new and improved English version like the Standard American Revised and substituting as often as possible even here the marginal readings. This version makes the Psalms more vivid and meaningful in many places. Take for example Psalm 34: 5, "They looked unto Him and were lightened" becomes "They looked unto Him and were radiant." We understand that. We have seen it. Now and then we have felt it, the glory of the radiant face which has looked unto God and been illumined.

And the Psalms need to be read with both an historical and with a practical imagination. When we remember the defenseless villages on the plains or in the valleys, and the place of safety in the rocks on the hills above to which in peril the villagers may flee, where often in dangerous times, some will habitually live, we realize the glad significance of the aged Psalmist's prayer: "Be Thou to me a rock of habitation, whereunto I may continually resort." (Psalm 71: 3.) That is the Old Testament way of saying what Paul says in the terms of the Gospel: "Ye are dead and your lives are hid with Christ in God." And we need a practical spiritual imagination to make a quick application of the Psalms to ourselves, "Thou hast visited me in the night. Thou hast tried me and findest nothing." (Psalm 17: 3.) That is a good evening verse. "Character," Moody used to quote in one of his favorite apothegms which his quick memory had caught and held, "Character is what a man is in the dark." A man with a good character is one who can use the Psalmist's words as his own. In the night no surprise can discover evil in him.

For all of us the Psalms have their rich purpose and use. It is a grievous thing if by neglect we are missing it. Those who feed here are nourished into reverence and power.

"WHERE THERE IS NO VISION."

BY JOHN A. SIMPSON.

In the present hard-headed, work-a-day world there is a disposition to relegate to the rear all that is not called practical. It is a realistic age, and an interrogation point of doubt or an exclamation point of derision is placed after every profession or phenomenon that does not wear the badge of materialism.

And yet the universe of mind is as real as the world of matter. Alexander the Great subjugated the known world, and wept, so it is said, because there was no other to conquer; but even he was unable to control his own heart. Is it not written in an ancient book that he that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city?

There is an eternity attached to ideas that is not associated with things material. The Romans may destroy Jerusalem, but the religion of a handful of Jewish fishermen and common people will seize the very capital of the empire and hold it for the cross forever. The monuments of the Cæsars may crumble to dust, but the writings of Virgil will be read always. The splendors of Athens may be reduced to powder, but the songs of Homer have perpetual youth.

There is more power in a thought than in an army. Cato repeated daily the unpopular sentiment: "Carthage must be destroyed;" and it was done. Joan of Arc was an embodied idea. The Sermon on the Mount is mightier than the proclamations of a thousand kings. The Golden Rule is a better defense than all the guns of Christendom. Better to be the author of "Home, Sweet Home" than the hero of fifty battles. Better to have written "Paradise Lost" than to have conquered a hundred cities. Where David is honored once for being king he is loved a thousand times for writing the Shepherd Psalm.

In the last analysis it is the ideal and not the material that rules the world. In the long run it is the prophet and not the captain whose word is law. In the end it is the dreamer who sees best.

It is the prophet, whether he be preacher or teacher, poet or sage, shepherd or hod-carrier, who listens to whispers of revelation, who sees over the blind hills of the present a scintillating gleam of the future, who, forgetting the things that were, presses forward to the things that should be, it is he who is the world's truest hero; it is he who sets the outposts of civilization, and advances the standards of progress.

No man can be a good citizen who does not have in his nature some element of second sight. If in bread he see nothing but sustenance; if in fire he find nothing but warmth; if in all of nature he behold only the material and not the intellectual and moral of which nature is the shadow; if in human longing and stress and strife, in sin and sorrow and suffering, in joy and honor and virtue—if in these he behold not truth to revere, and falsehood to abhor and to battle against, then he has mistaken the courtyard for the inner palace; then he has halted in the outer portal when the rended veil welcomes him to the Holy Place.

Why does the flag of one's country stir one's emotions, and waken one's patriotic ardor? It is because the flag is an emblem—not of silk—not of color—but of one's country itself. The flag suggests to the patriot a vision of his own land.

And what is one's country? Surely more than a simple expanse of land; more than earth and sky and water; more than the hand can touch and the eye can see.

One's country is home and kindred and neighborhood; it is birthplace and altar and burial ground; it is law, order and justice; it is history, opportunity and promise. One's country is every social institution that has woven a fiber of his being. It is in part the nature one knows and every phenomenon that he commonly meets. The soil indeed, the stream, the wood and the sky; the pasture and the fields of grain; the garden and orchard and meadow. It is the daily rise and setting of the sun, the snowy treasures of winter, the subtle allurements of spring and autumn, the bursting wealth of many a harvest home. One's country is the city or village or town in which one lives; the streets and roads he travels; the markets and stores he visits; the school he attends, and the church where he worships—these and the many other things that go to make up one's daily life are all involved in the term "one's country," and the flag that he honors represents to him those things. There need be no flag if there can be no vision.

Oh, for a deeper sense of sight! Intellectual and moral and spiritual perception that peers through the gloom of selfishness and distrust and falsehood, and pierces the realm beyond, and sees, nor ever fails to follow, the gleaming ray of some fair star of idealism that will lead the wise man to some God-given Bethlehem!

And in this aspiration one is in line with reason, for anticipation is the basis of reasoning; and one is in line with philosophy, for hope is the center of all thought; and one is in line with wisdom, for Solomon wrote three thousand years ago: "Where there is no vision the people perish."

FOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

AN HISTORIC RELIC.

BY WALTER C. WOODWARD.

Recently an old pulpit was found among the rubbish in the basement of the main building at Pacific College. To the casual observer there would have been nothing in this old piece of ecclesiastic furniture to inspire a second thought. There it lay, just a plain, unpretentious and worn pulpit, evidently awaiting the ax of some thoughtless iconoclast to chop it up into kindling wood.

But to some who knew the history of the old relic, the sight of it kindled emotions difficult to express, in the light of which flashed the picture of other days. The old pulpit should be preserved and placed in the college museum; its value as a silent, historic witness demands it. From the best information at hand, this was the first pulpit erected by Friends on the Pacific coast, certainly in the Pacific Northwest. It was built nearly twenty-five years ago by David J. Wood, now of Whittier, Cal., and was put in the then new church in the east part of the present town of Newburg, on the site now occupied by the residence of J. M. Wright. That was a great day for the future of this new, sparsely settled country. Led by Uncle William Hobson, a "settlement" had been established here which was the nucleus not only of the Newburg of to-day, but of Oregon Yearly Meeting. What is now the town was then the forest and the wheatfield. The old pulpit, lying on the rubbish heap, was the precursor of the religious, educational, social and industrial development of this country of forests, fields, of fruits and flowers.

What thronging memories come trooping home, called by the sight of this old piece of workmanship! To one who was then of very tender years, the general picture is resolved into an indistinct and hazy background, in which, however, stand out certain characters and incidents in clear relief. But as the old pulpit has served its generation and has been replaced by another in a finer edifice, so the fathers and mothers in Israel, who were associated so closely with it, have trod serenely and quietly the shaded, downward path that leads into the valley of the peaceful sunset glow, the valley which is watered by the river of eternal life. What tender recollections remain of "those immortal dead who live again in lives made better by their presence."

What youthful mind will ever forget the benign countenance of Uncle William Hobson, who sat "head of the meeting?" The simplicity and deep devotion of him who unostentatiously removed from the pulpit the vase of flowers lest the attention of the carnal mind be drawn from things eternal to things earthly and perishing? Narrow? Not to one who heard his words of benediction or felt his life of wide sympathy and love.

No picture was more indelibly fixed in my memory than that of this father in Israel turning to Uncle Thomas Hadley, another well-remembered patriarch, and closing the meeting with a solemn hand-clasp. Possibly the longing with which the small boy, seeking a "sign," gazed around the old pulpit at those sitting behind it, had something to do with the strong impression left on his youthful mind. And there was that vigorous man of power and eloquence, Dr. Elias Jessup. Let the word pass through the community that he was to preach, and outsiders throughout the neighborhood crowded in to hear him. Uncle John Edwards, Joseph Hookins, the good wives of all these mentioned, and so many others step out from the shadows of the past when one gets to musing on the old days.

No carriages and fine turnouts then to carry the worshipers to the old meeting house on Sabbath morning. The old farm wagon sufficed for all, and if, as the heavy vehicle jolted over the corduroy road, the boy who sat over the hind wheels on a board seat found the springs a trifle stiff, he listened to his teeth chatter and observed his cheeks "jolt up and down" until the sensation should become monotonous, when he experimented by standing on his tiptoes to break the jar. And it was a noteworthy milestone in his life, when, after meeting, he was allowed to go get the team, and with much unnecessary flourish, drive up to the meeting stile for the waiting family. And if, by a surreptitious prod, he could get one of the staid old farm horses to prance a little, his cup was full to overflowing. But if his folks didn't drive home with some other family for dinner, or vice versa, the day was a failure from his youthful standpoint, and he would refuse to be comforted.

On one Sabbath of each month, the mothers fixed up and took big baskets of dinner to meeting, and the whole day was spent at the church. In the afternoon enthusiastic temperance meetings were held, and right here may be discovered the foundation of the strong prohibition sentiment which has always characterized this neighborhood.

Those were foundation days and the old pulpit was the center of the pulsating life of the new neighborhood. Here were centered not only the religious, but also the literary, the social and the educational interests of the community. Not even with a church organ did it divide its reign of power, and in fancy the writer can even yet hear the strains of "He Leadeth Me" as, unaccompanied by instrument of human workmanship, the strains of the old hymn were voiced from hearts of faith and trust. And who will say that in the years which followed, He has not led? Some safely upward, to lives of much service and usefulness, who are now on the mountain-top of life; some gently and carefully down the declining slopes on the other side into the valley of the shadow.

Yes, those were good old days, and they have their lessons. With their simple, unpretentious pulpit they would warn the church against

"Counting, too oft, its living members less Than the wall's garnish and the pulpit's dress."

As it has been set aside for the new pulpit, so many of the methods of its day have been replaced by those more progressive and more adapted to present-day problems confronting us. But could the old, rejected pulpit be given voice for one message, would it not plead for the same simplicity and sincerity, the same earnestness, the same zeal for service which characterized those faithful leaders who toiled in the early days and who have gone on before?

"Oh spirit of that early day,
So pure and strong and true,
Be with us in the narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew.
Give strength the evil to forsake,
The cross of Truth to bear,
And love and reverent fear to make
Our daily lives a prayer."

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.

Indiana Yearly Meeting was held at Richmond from Ninth month 26th to Tenth month 3d. The average attendance was much larger than usual, and it was noteworthy that there were almost as many present on the closing day as at the opening. The First-day preceding the Yearly Meeting had been quite generally observed as a time of special prayer for this Yearly Meeting, and the members came together under a solemn sense of responsibility and with an earnest desire to know and do the will of God. A remarkable spirit of unity characterized the deliberations, and the business was transacted with dignity and ability.

Timothy Nicholson was appointed presiding clerk; Anna M. Roberts, recording clerk; Charles A. Francisco and Edith Hunt, reading clerks; and Ancil E. Ratliff, announcing clerk. All the sessions were held jointly as last year. A minute was prepared and recorded, showing that the custom of holding all the sessions together arose because the character of the tent in which the Meeting was held last year at Marion made it necessary, and that the women Friends retain the right to hold separate sessions whenever they desire.

The meetings for worship, held each morning at 8 o'clock and every evening not occupied by business sessions, were characterized by messages of spiritual power and instruction. In the after-meetings there were a number of conversions and many inquirers received help they sought. On First-day there were forty-one services held in Richmond in which Friends participated, all but nine of them being in churches of other denominations. This interdenominational fellowship is one of the most gratifying features of yearly meeting time. The thousands who were present on First-day were very orderly, and more of them than usual listened to the preaching of the gospel.

The following were present with credentials: From Western Yearly Meeting, Rebecca Flagler, Emily Ellis, Gertrude Moon Reinier, Mary A. Cox, Charlotte Vickers, Griffith Wright, Minnie Bassett; from Kansas, Daniel A. Williams, I. Emory Pearson; from Wilmington, John L. Kittrel, Nathan and Esther Frame, Thomas Miller, Edward and Maggie Hughs; from North Carolina, J. Robert Parker; from Iowa, Zenas L. Martin; from California, William H. and Linda M. Coffin.

The reports of the various standing committees showed all lines of the Meeting's work well sustained and in some cases substantially increased. Various phases of the work were presented in some very forcible addresses. First among these should be mentioned the eloquent address by Col. George R. Bain, of Kentucky, on "The Safe Side of Life for Young Men." At the Bible School session Clarence Case showed the need of a system of Bible school lessons more in accord with modern pedagogy; Zenas L. Martin spoke on the missionary work in Cuba, and Morton C. Pearson on the work of Indiana Yearly Meeting in Mexico for the missionary boards; at the Christian Endeavor session, Allen Jay presented the claims of the ministry on our young men and women, and Elbert Russell spoke on our Quaker literature.

The report of the statistical secretary showed a net gain in membership of 194 for the year. The present membership is 20,609.

The state of society claimed the earnest attention of the Yearly Meeting, and a committee was appointed to visit and assist certain deficient Quarterly Meetings.

The educational work of the Yearly Meeting is in a flourishing condition. Especial attention was given to Fairmount and Spiceland Academies. During the past summer an effort has been made to unify the educational work and secure more definite relations between the academies and Earlham College. The college begins the present year with important additions to its faculty and material equipment. The enrollment has reached almost 300, so that it has been necessary to rent a building for a dormitory.

While thoroughly in sympathy with the purposes of the Anti-Saloon League, the Yearly Meeting declined to appoint trustees for the League in Indiana because it did not wish to be officially related to an organization so nearly political in its nature.

The greatest interest of the Yearly Meeting seemed to center in the evangelistic, pastoral and church extension work, foreign missions and Christian Endeavor. The Meeting felt a deep concern to reach the heathen and the unconverted, and to be recruiting its ranks and workers from among the unsaved and the young. A subscription and collection amounting to $1,136.09 was taken up for the Evangelistic Committee. It was an encouraging feature of this that it was given in comparatively small sums, and expressed the general interest of the membership in this work. The Yearly Meeting appropriated $1,500 for this work in addition to the subscriptions. Two new meetings have already been established; the committee is waiting for an opening in Dayton, Ohio, and Charles and May Replogle have begun a work of establishing Friends' meetings in the State of Washington which is full of promise. On account of ill health, Joseph O. Binford was released as general superintendent of the Evangelistic, Pastoral and Church Extension Work, and Ira C. Johnson was appointed in his stead.

The report of the secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions was most gratifying. There has been substantial growth both in the membership of the missionary societies and in the contributions for the support of the missionary work. Every Quarterly Meeting contributed something. The work in Mexico is expanding. The Boys' School at Victoria is so crowded that the building is to be enlarged soon to accommodate those who are seeking opportunity to enter the institute.

For the first time the Yearly Meeting gave an appropriation to the Christian Endeavor Union. It has arranged to keep Daisy Barr, of Marion, in the field the coming year as evangelist and organizer for the Christian Endeavor work.

An advance was made in the direction of religious education. The five members of the Joint Committee on the Bible Institute, who are appointed by Indiana Yearly Meeting, were constituted a Committee on Religious Education, to promote religious and moral education within the Yearly Meeting, both in co-operation with its existing educational agencies and in other ways as they find opportunity. The Meeting was impressed with the necessity of a more general knowledge of Quaker literature and principles, if progress is to be in accordance with Friends' distinctive principles. A special appropriation of $50 was made to the Book and Tract Committee for the purpose of increasing the usefulness of the Yearly Meeting's reference library at Earlham College.

THE SUFFERING OF CHRIST.

BY ALEXANDER MACLAREN.

The suffering of Christ was threefold: the suffering of flesh and blood—the suffering of the body, every nerve of which became the avenue of pain; the suffering of the mind, in view of great problems; the suffering of the heart, pouring out love not responded to and left solitary and alone—the suffering which a man bears as part of the human family, which made the Master often sigh and extorted tears at the grave of Lazarus.

Our Master had flesh and blood. He knows what flesh suffers when it is lacerated and torn; He knows what blood suffers when it runs hot or cold; He knows all the exigencies and conditions, and sorrows, and pangs of our human heart. All this is known to Him, and He was perfected in knowing it, that He might be a perfect Priest and Saviour, Friend and Sympathizer.

There was suffering that came to Him from temptation. He did not know what it is to fail: we have known temptation by failure; He knew what it was by bearing and vanquishing it—as in the forty days of temptation and in the garden of Gethsemane.

There were also His sufferings as the Mediator, when upon His heart He took the guilt of the world. We know something of that. We know how we feel when we are in contact with those tens of thousands who are pent up in miserable hovels, where prayer and decency are alike impossible, when we pass down the hospital ward, where our daughter or our son brings disgrace to our name. We know something of what it is to bear the injustice and pain and wrong of the world, but not as He did, for He bore it as the Mediator, and by bearing it put it away, both the penalty and the blame.

And so to-day we behold Him perfected through suffering; through suffering making His way into the glory and standing there perfected, to become Priest and Saviour for us. We must not look at the cross alone, but at the throne to which it led. Angels are beneath His feet, and devils; all creation does Him homage; all the worlds wait upon His will; but we are His brothers. He is the Son and we are sons. Our Brother is on the throne, and we are being brought to stand by His side.

We, also, must be perfected—by the suffering of flesh and blood, by wrestling with temptation, by bearing in our measure the sorrows and sins of men, and filling up what is behind of the sufferings of Christ.

Do not tell us to evade suffering; do not hold us back with pity; do not spend tears upon us; do not tell us that we must stand aside and be darlings of fortune, only caressed by the soft air and kissed by sunbeams: let us go the way our Captain went before. There is no way to His crown but by the cross; no way of being perfected but by suffering.

Let us bear it as He bore it—willingly, with the sweat upon our brow, but with loyalty to the will of God in our heart. Let us suffer so. Then the darkness will vanish and the light come; then the Cross will be behind us forever, and the crown beckoning us before; and, like our Lord, we shall be perfected through suffering.

TENTH MONTH 23, 1904.

ELISHA AND NAAMAN.

2 Kings 5: 1-14.

Second-day, Tenth mo. 17.—Elisha and Naaman 2 Kings 5: 1-14.

Third-day, Tenth mo. 18.—Gehazi's punishment. 2 Kings 5: 15-27.

Fourth-day, Tenth mo. 19.—The ten lepers. Luke 17: 11-19.

Fifth-day, Tenth mo. 20.—Christ's touch. Mark 1: 35-45.

Sixth-day, Tenth mo. 21.—"I went and washed." John 9: 1-11.

Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 22.—Prayer for cleansing. Psalm 51: 1-13.

First-day, Tenth mo. 23.—Promise of cleansing. Jer. 33: 1-9.

Time.—Probably about 847 B. C.

Place.—First at Damascus, capital of Syria, then at Samaria, and at the Jordan. Samaria was a little over one hundred miles in a direct line from Damascus. The nearest fords of the Jordan where Naaman could have dipped himself were about twenty-five miles from Samaria.

Rulers.—Benhadad II, king of Syria; Jehoram, king of Israel; Joram, king of Judah. Read the whole history of Naaman, 2 Kings 5.

1. "Naaman." The word means "pleasant" or "beautiful." "Captain of the host." The chief general. "A great man with his master." Highly trusted and relied upon. "Honorable." Literally, "a man of respect." See Isa. 3: 3; Job 22: 8. "Deliverance." "Victory." In some of the wars with Israel his generalship had given Benhadad the victory. "But he was a leper." The blot on the scutcheon, the terrible possibility, a loathsome disease, always before him. It is quite evident that at the time of the story the disease had not made such progress as to disqualify Naaman from fulfilling his ordinary occupations. It is also true that other nations were not so particular as the Israelites in isolating the sufferers. Exactly what form had attacked Naaman is not told. It was an incurable disease. The progress of the disease is sometimes exceedingly slow. It is rare in temperate climates. The causes, progress, symptoms and treatment of the disease are still being carefully studied.

2. "In bands," R. V. Raiding parties. Such things are still done along the Turkish border. See 2 Kings 6: 13; 13: 20.

3. "Would God." A strong expression. "The prophet that is in Samaria." The cures of the prophet must have been well known in Israel.

4. "And one." Possibly Naaman, but not likely. It was probably brought about through his wife. Naaman would not be likely to have much faith in a cure.

5. "Go to, go." Go at once. "The king of Israel." Probably Jehoram, the son of Ahab. He doubtless thought that the prophet was attached to the court as a soothsayer, and the best way to reach him was through his master. "Ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold." It is not possible to give any accurate statement of the value. All money at this time was calculated by weight, there were no coins. Roughly speaking, the proposed present would amount to about $20,000 in silver and $58,000 in gold, but the sums are intended to express a great value rather than an exact amount. "Changes of raiment." Costly robes. The eastern custom of gifts of clothing is still kept up.

6. "That thou mayest recover him of his leprosy." That is, through the prophet.

7. As leprosy was an incurable disease, the king naturally thought the king of Syria wished to pick a quarrel with him.

8. Why the king had not sent for Elisha does not appear. Elisha, though a great prophet, seems to have been neglected by the king. "That there is a prophet in Israel." That is, a true prophet of Jehovah.

9. "Horses and chariots," R. V. Making a great show. The story is condensed, for Naaman had evidently been informed of the residence of Elisha.

10. Here, as in the case of the Shunammite, Elisha sent by a third person. It was not that he wished to avoid contact with a leper, but that he did not wish in any way to be considered more than an instrument in the hands of Jehovah, to whom he wished Naaman to ascribe his cure. It was also intended to humble his pride and test his obedience. "Go wash in Jordan." Naaman would know that in themselves there was no virtue in these waters, otherwise there would be no lepers in Israel, hence a great test of his faith, and, if obedient, the belief that the cure was wrought by Jehovah, the God of Israel. "Seven times." The sacred number, and often used in the Bible, e. g., the seven priests who blew the seven trumpets, the seven times of marching round Jericho, the seven "spirits before the throne," the seven churches.

11. Naaman's conduct and words were most natural. He had thought that Elisha would cure him at once, and, like the necromancers, with a great deal of parade, and besides all this that he would treat him as became his rank and position. "The Lord his God." Naaman believed that Jehovah was the God of Israel, not of the whole earth. "Strike." "Ware," R. V.

12. "Abana and Pharpar." Streams at Damascus famous for the clearness of their waters; the Jordan was, below the Lake of Galilee, muddy and turbid. If there was any healing in water his own rivers were surely the best.

13. "Servants." Not servitors, but probably men near his own rank, as we still use the word in "servant of state," etc. They used a little common sense. It was a very easy thing to do, and he could do it on his way home.

14. Naaman yielded to reason and common sense, and received the reward of his faith and obedience.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Apparently insignificant persons and events often play an essential part in great events.
2. Faith and obedience are essential to complete cures.
3. God almost always requires us to do something ourselves.
4. Pride, self-confidence, preconceived notions must be given up in order to receive God's choicest blessings.

Christian Endeavor.

TOPIC FOR TENTH MONTH TWENTY-THIRD.

HOW CAN WE ENLARGE AND IMPROVE OUR WORK?

Matt. 21: 17-22; Isa. 54: 2.

Second-day, Tenth mo. 17.—Abram's horizon. Gen. 12: 1-9.
 Third-day, Tenth mo. 18.—David's aggressiveness. 2 Sam. 8: 1-18.
 Fourth-day, Tenth mo. 19.—Solomon's enlargement. 1 Kings 4: 29-31.
 Fifth-day, Tenth mo. 20.—Christ's bold programme. Mark 16: 15-18.
 Sixth-day, Tenth mo. 21.—Antioch reaching out. Acts 11: 21-26.
 Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 22.—Paul's ambition. Rom. 15: 23-32.

The first enlargement is always within. There are exceptions, doubtless, but in general when a man is too big for his place he moves out and up. "A man's gift maketh room for him," and we and our societies have not far to look for work if we are really ready to be workers. A recent brief magazine note says that "the great majority of clerks remain clerks," and gives as the explanation that "there is only a man or two in every hundred (perhaps fewer) who has the constructive qualities required for leadership."

Endeavor is a school that Christ has used for the development of this very quality of constructive service, for which there is need no less in the church than in the commercial world or in government. But the supremacy that He advocates is one of service, of serviceableness. It meant less that God should promise to Abraham that he should become a great nation than that in him all the nations of the earth should be blessed. Great nations have come and gone, but the promised blessing has no end.

Abraham's greatness had its spring in faithfulness leading to obedience. Christ said to His disciples "Have faith and doubt not," and it was such faith as that that made of Abraham an ancestor to be reckoned from, instead of remaining merely the son of Terah. There have been enlargers in our nation's past, and it is worth something to be a "Son" or a "Daughter" of an honorable line, but it is greater to be a founder than a mere appendage.

In Acts 11 several verses tell of a great revival at Antioch, but we almost know more of what was going on there from just one verse in the thirteenth chapter, one which closes with "they sent them away." The spirit of enlargement was at work and it found expression as Christ would have it, for He desires men and women who, like Paul, are "ready to preach the Gospel," "ready also to die for the name of the Lord Jesus."

Some societies are studying the local fields and find that by just a little lengthening of the cords and strengthening the stakes they can gather in many right at hand, and the "increase" campaign has changed from so many per cent to so many fold. Others are looking abroad under the guidance of the missionary impulse that is unceasingly called into activity by the "Go ye" of our Lord.

Wherever we may look, we need have no fear of lack of opportunity. The great essential is to have that visual power that Christ had, that saw the man in the beggar, the faith-filled suppliant in the trembling woman whose hand but touched His garment, and the type of the King's subjects in the little child. In all He saw the whitened harvest. "Faith working through love" will show us the same, and lead us out to do the "greater works" than His that are promised for the believer.

IN THE AFRICA INDUSTRIAL MISSION.

[Extracts from letters written by William Wendte while staying at the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission, Kiamosi, via Kisumu, British East Africa, covering the weeks from Third month 1st to Fourth month 25th, 1904. On Fourth month 28th he was killed by hostile natives.]

"Seventh-day noon, Second month 27th, I started off from Mombasa on the Uganda Railway for Port Florence, arriving there Second-day evening; I hustled to engage porters that evening to start up here early next morning with myself and baggage. Two porters for my hammock, for it is twenty miles up to Kiamosi and tough path; but I walked more than half the way at that, and got here in what Friends thought surprisingly good season.

"Thou can imagine how heartily I was welcomed, although they never even heard of me before. I am the only Friend they have seen from outside since the mission was started, two and a half years ago. I have ample quarters quite to myself, at present, in the unfinished grass house. The others live in the iron house nearby, and there we all feed three times a day—and how we do feed, too! Our food is so abundant and palatable that actually I overeat.

"This is a sightly and salubrious location, about 5,300 feet above sea level. Great view. Cool nights and cloudy days, but when sun does shine, it blazes. We are eight miles north of the equator; yet it seems not so tropical here because of altitude.

"Industrially, Friends are chiefly occupied with brickmaking and building dam and sluiceway for a saw-mill; otherwise they are teaching children and itinerating a little.

"The natives, among whom they work, are the untouched Kavirondo, an artless, hardly nice tribe, but docile, I am thinking. They are industrious (for Africans); an agricultural folk, indeed. The men hunt with spears and arrows, and the women smoke elongated pipes. They live in circular thatch huts. The men hang a patch of cowhide over their shoulders, perhaps for embellishment rather than for apparel, or else they wear utterly nothing; the women sometimes have the patch of hide, too, or sometimes only a necklace. Already I have seen a number minus even that. I fear they shiver these cool mornings. They speak but little Kiswahili, which the mission teaches instead of English.

"Somehow I am drawn toward these dark and dirty people. These about the mission are so faithful and trusting, for one thing, that we come to love them. It warms my heart to have their grins and greetings fired at me from all sides as I go about the grounds. I am present in the dispensary every afternoon to observe and to help, if possible, the natives who crawl in with their ulcers and wounds. Elisha Blackburn is a physician and surgeon, and his wife a trained nurse, and the medical is an important part of the work, of course.

"There may not be any other Europeans (i. e., whites) nearer here than Port Florence, twenty miles away; so we are indeed isolated. One of our boys goes to Kisumu, the post office of Port Florence, once a week for mail. A safari (march or caravan) of twenty miles is not very considerable here. The two dreaded beasts of Africa, the lion and the rhinoceros, are not found up here, but Friends saw an elephant a few weeks ago. This is a very healthy location; water sweet and abundant, but alas! it has to be lugged from a distance by the 'boys.' The servants are all clothed, of course, chiefly in a kunsa or tunic, meant to be white, and a white skull-cap. The cook is a Baganda, and under Mrs. Blackburn's coaching has become quite skillful. Thou can judge that there are inconveniences and discomforts, hardships thou might say, but Friends are all jolly and we enjoy each other.

"I arise at six, it is dark then; I must light my little lamp. There aren't long dawns and twilights in the tropics as at home. Breakfast at 6.30. Then service with all the people on the place, some fifty, perhaps. They sing hymns and Arthur Chilson reads the Bible and talks to them, all in Kiswahili, except that Ahonya interprets the talk into Kavirondo. On First-days natives come from the surrounding region, sometimes a few hundred have gathered at a meeting. We haven't a meeting house, the natives squat on the ground and we sit in chairs facing them. If it rains—why then it rains!

"Onduso is a grand chief from Gemi, near the Yale River, whom the government has given Friends to bring up. He is about ten years old now, very ugly, very dignified and very sharp. His retinue is quite important as it tags him about the premises, the royal kinsman behind with his highness' little one-legged stool. All natives, women as well as men, who are attached to the station, must wear at least one garment in public. They are always provided gratis with one cheap red Indian blanket to start with and a pair of cotton drawers and a shirt. One of these three they must wear. They have circuses sometimes in teaching them how.

"Seventh-day morning, Third month 12th, Edgar Hole and I started on safari for Kavinis, some ten miles distant, to spend First-day and hold meeting. This is truly Scriptural missionary work. At Kavinis they were so desirous to have us come that they built a hut for us to live in while there, and Ogalos people over in Margoli are willing to do the same. In this hut are kept a few necessities for a brief occupancy, such as cooking vessels, dishes, blankets, etc. It is only of grass, of course, but Friends made a rough plank door, which is padlocked while the hut is unoccupied and the key is kept here. Perhaps thou does not know yet that the typical Kavirondo hut is circular, with conical roof projecting over the walls to form eaves, as it were. The entrance is rather low, but one can stand upright inside. There are no windows or egress for smoke. At night a screen or the like is pulled across the doorway. On one side, in all the larger huts, at any rate, the floor—which is of packed dirt smeared with cattle manure—is raised a little and poles, like rude stanchions, are placed there. This is the part reserved for cows and sheep and goats. The hut frame is of poles and sticks bound with vines or bark fibers, and all is thatched with coarse grass. There usually seem to be no beds nor bedding. Apparently most natives sleep on the dirt floor, if covered at all, probably only with their patch of cow-skin. Friends' hut at Kavinis is typical, except for the door and lack of cattle quarters, and besides they did not take the trouble to pound a floor for us, so there is only grass. Friends also made a rough bedstead there by driving four upright poles into the ground, binding cross poles to these, then upon this frame spreading sticks for slats and finally covering with grass. (Some natives on the station have made beds for themselves like this.) Also Friends made a little rough table for the hut. This is not at all a contemptible shelter for us when on safari. We do no cooking inside, but have a fire on stones nearby, which is always practicable, at least, for boiling. The sufuria, a metal pot, and the nyungu, an earthen jar, can be used on anything in the way of a fire.

Educational.

FRIENDS' UNIVERSITY NOTES.

Friends' University began its seventh year of work Ninth month 12th, with a bright outlook for the year's work. The formal opening took place Third-day afternoon at three o'clock. The address was given by Dr. Hoyt, presiding elder of the Methodist church, and was filled with good thoughts for the young people. He spoke of the student body as a company, selected according to two forces. The first is a desire, at first vague, perhaps, then more definitely alive; a determination on the part of each individual to make of himself the best. The young man or woman who comes empty-handed except for this purpose, is to be congratulated. The second force of selection is the selection or determination made by someone else for the individual. In the union of these two forces is the greatest strength.

After the address, Prof. Lucy Francisco played Chopin's ballade in G minor. This was Prof. Francisco's first appearance in public since her return from Berlin and she was greeted most enthusiastically.

The various improvements made this summer at the university have added greatly to the general attractiveness. The five-foot cement walk from the main entrance to University Avenue is a convenient improvement, and it adds greatly to the appearance of the campus. The new rooms in the south wing are now ready for occupancy. They are among the most cheerful and pleasant rooms in the building. There are now twenty-five recitation rooms, two offices, assembly room, Christian Association room, gymnasium and bath rooms finished. The heating apparatus is being extended and put in good repair. Much general improving of the building is also being done.

The librarian has just finished cataloguing a shipment of about one hundred new books. Half of these are standard histories, a donation made by Joshua L. Bailey, of Philadelphia.

The prospects of the music school are particularly good for this year. A large number of students are enrolling for music, both piano and vocal. The Ladies' Glee Club and Men's Club will soon be at active work. Both will be strong organizations this year.

A few changes have been made in the faculty. Sara E. Norcross, Master of Arts from the University of Chicago, has been elected to fill the chair of ancient languages, left vacant by the resignation of Daisy Dixon. Helen Hoover, of Earlham College, was elected to the chair of modern languages. The faculty was increased by the election of Bertha Wentworth, Friends' University, '03, as assistant in the preparatory department. The return of Lucy Francisco, professor of music, after a year spent in study at Berlin, is announced with pleasure. Her influence among the young people and her work are greatly valued by Friends' University.

Correspondence.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

William C. Allen's article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of last week, I think, is important; and it is to be hoped Friends everywhere in America will see its importance and be prompt to follow his suggestion, and write a few lines expressing our disapproval of such gigantic military preparations. True, Friends and some others are exempt from all forms of military service, but as no one lives to himself, Friends with others will feel the burden put upon the country in taxes, in loss of time from honorable, useful employment and in the moral effect that will follow such a procedure. The right of petition is a sacred right, and if Friends neglect to use it they cannot with propriety complain of the condition of things brought about by legislation. Whenever there have been important laws enacted or officers have enforced laws tending to bring about a better state of affairs, it is none the less a citizen's duty to express his sympathy and approval to those who have been the means of such steps being taken.

Very truly,

D. W. LAWRENCE.

Hillside, I. T.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Noticing by the report of the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission, in which Arthur B. Chilson states that the work of the mission, and especially their building, would be very much facilitated if they had a molder and mortiser, and knowing the value of two such machines in ordinary house building, I felt a deep concern that I might help answer his and other prayers for them. Accordingly I laid the matter before my employer, Thomas P. Egan, and he was kind enough to make the two machines for about half their real worth, and the committee was pleased to accept.

I made a former request for money and as far as I know very little has been given. But it is not too late now, and since that time the machinery has been shipped and is well on its way to Africa. I am sure the committee needs and would be glad to receive the whole $300.

I wish to ask again that you make another effort to help this worthy cause in a financial way. I think we should, since T. P. Egan, who is not a member of our church, is willing to give almost as much as the amount asked of us. I feel sure that we can supply the rest and I hope to have a good response. Can you not give some little to help raise the $300? I trust our Heavenly Father will put it into your hearts to give for the success of the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission. Send same to W. C. Taber, 173 Chambers Street, New York, N. Y.

I remain yours for the success of the Friends' Africa Industrial Mission.

Editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

At Amesbury Monthly Meeting, held at Pittsfield, N. H., Ninth month 1st, George G. Williams, of Lansdowne, Pa.; John S. Kimber, of Newport, R. I., and Zillah Binns, of Lawrence, Mass., were in attendance and remained over the following First-day. George G. Williams continued the work until the following Sixth-day. The meetings from the first were held in "the demonstration and power of the Spirit." The Lord greatly honored the work, six professed conversion. Several sought and found the baptism of the Holy Ghost. Conviction rested on sinners in general. Pittsfield Meeting is a small meeting situated in the country about twenty-five miles north of Manchester, N. H., the nearest Friends' meeting being in Epping, N. H. This meeting belongs to Amesbury (Mass.) Monthly and Salem Quarterly Meeting has been established over one hundred years. At one time the meeting was laid down for a few years. Within the past twenty years Charles H. Jones and wife, the late Elizabeth Larkin, and many others have sowed precious seed. We are now reaping the result of the labor bestowed. We have been much favored this summer by the help of people spending the summer in town. One young man from Massachusetts, a Methodist, has been attending all our meetings, including the mid-week meeting; his services have been helpful. This meeting is without a minister and has had some hard struggles for existence, but we feel that it is in a live condition.

At our last Sabbath evening meeting one young man manifested a desire to become a Christian. Among the helps for the summer have been Israel Baker and wife, of Knoxville, Tenn., formerly Friends at Adrian, Mich. George G. Williams left here for Manchester, where he attended three meetings, from there to Gonic, N. H., where he had one meeting; thence to Augusta, and Hollowell, Maine, where meetings were held with good results. We feel that we were much favored to have such devoted workers, and trust that the good work will go steadily on. Will the readers please remember this field in their prayers?

Willis H. White, a valued member of Providence Monthly Meeting, is this year the Prohibition candidate for lieutenant-governor of Rhode Island on a ticket headed for governor by Henry B. Metcalf, the party's nominee for Vice-President four years ago.

Indiana Yearly Meeting sent a message of love and sympathy to Dr. Richard H. Thomas. It arrived in time for him to know that he was kindly thought of in the great assembly at Richmond. The telegram announcing his death arrived just after the meeting had concluded.

By an error it was reported in our issue of Ninth month 22d, that Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting, at which the article entitled "Some Notes of Historic Interest" was read, was held in Poughkeepsie. The meeting referred to was held at La Grange, New York, on ground originally purchased by the Dorlands.

The funeral of Richard H. Thomas was held in the Baltimore Meeting House, on the afternoon of the 6th inst. The attendance was large and the feeling of deep loss was very evident. Lindley D. Clark, of Washington; Samuel R. Neave, of Hughesville, Md.; Annie D. Stabler, of Conowingo, Md., and Rufus M. Jones took part in the vocal exercises.

Bur Oak Monthly Meeting, Glenwood, Iowa, is rejoicing in a wonderful uplift which it has experienced through the labors of Lurana M. Terrell, Mary Hoit and Bertha Humiston, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, who held protracted meetings there from the 19th ult. to the 3d inst. Seventy-six professed Jesus as their Saviour. Thirty-three have made request for membership with Friends.

Berkeley Quarterly Meeting was held Ninth month 3d, for the first time at San Francisco, Cal. There is a young but thriving meeting at that place, in connection with which both day and night mission work is carried on. The quarterly meeting was a season of blessing and revival interest where souls were searched and blessed. Harry R. Keats, John Riley and others were present.

In the absence of any recorded minister in the meeting at Woonsocket, R. I., the preaching of Leander Fisher, one of the elders, has been very acceptable during the past summer. Mary Elma Richardson, a minister, has just removed to Woonsocket from Lewiston, Me., to reside with her daughter. With her co-operation it is probable that the work will be carried on for a time longer without the services of a regular pastor. The Sabbath morning meetings here have an average attendance of 48.

The Church Extension Committee of New York Yearly Meeting have prepared a list of 36 lectures covering a wide range of subjects—History, Travels, Literature, Religion, Ethics, Peace, Temperance, Christian Endeavor, Missionary, Biblical, Doctrinal, Evangelistic. Eighteen different speakers have offered their services subject to the call of local meetings. Quarterly Meetings, missionary meetings, Bible school conferences, Christian Endeavor rallies, temperance meetings, conversation classes and special occasions will do well to secure one or more of them. A prospectus can be secured by addressing J. L. Spicer, 177 Mansion Street, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Feeling the need of a closer union of the ministers of Western Yearly Meeting, a plan has been perfected for the organization of a ministerial association of this Yearly Meeting. The meetings of the organization will be held in Friends' Meeting House, Indianapolis, at which times practical questions and problems facing Friends' ministers of to-day will be discussed. The first meeting will occur Eleventh month 1st, with an all day's session, beginning at 10 a. m. All ministers are specially urged to be present if possible. Morton C. Pearson will discuss "The Great Needs of Our Ministry To-day." Dr. Sylvester Newlin will conduct a Pastors' Round Table in the afternoon. Please remember the date and attend.

The Friends of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting have arranged to hold a Bible Institute at Martinsville, Ohio, the 20th to 24th inst.
